

phite and mechanical, and those of Canada do not care for quantities.

It is, therefore, impossible to separate the several branches so as to ascertain the quantities of each of the three kinds we export—a point of considerable importance on account of the great difference in their value.

The business of Canada with the United Kingdom shows considerable development.

In 1899 we sent 6.5 per cent of the total value of wood pulp imported by Great Britain from all countries. This increased in 1900 to 9.4 per cent., and in 1901 to 13 per cent.
