ant factor during a thousand years, not only in the history of England, but in the affairs of Europe. Four hundred years before the days of the Stuart Kings, it was the profit from the fisheries that led the Germans from their inland towns to the Baltic, because in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, a great part of Europe was Catholic, holy days were strictly, kept, fish was the food of the people, and the industry thus an all-important one.

The Hansards, discovering the interest that factor during a thousand years, near the structure, wounding him severely and burying him beneath the ruins. He was rescued and sent to a hospital in London, and while he lay there ill, many of his finest war poems which appear in the present volume were written. Robert Graves, reading some of these poems in an English magazine, went to tall on Nichols at the hospital, and then and there began an intimate friendship between two of Britain's most noted soldier-poets. Europe was Catholic, holy days were strictly, kept, fish was the food of the people, and the industry thus an all-important one.

The Hansards, discovering the importance of salt as a preservative, captured the trade, and their power originated from it. Then came the westward migration of the herring and the discovery by a Dutchman of an improved way of curing and bar-relling the fish, which led to the Dutch domination of the fisheries and the growth of the Dutch mercantile marine and of the Dutch navy, which gave and received so many hard blows in the days of Charles I.

CASTORIA

For Infants and Children

The Colonial Empire followed, and with it the British exploitation and control of raw materials and the expansion of our overseas trade. German jealousy was, perhaps, only natural, and the repeal of the Navigation Acts in 1849 gave Germany her chance. She built a mercantile marine and then a feet, and finally reached areas of "castles in the air"—the dream of annihilating British naval power and of "freeing" the seas by dominating them herself.—M.E., in the Express.
