At Constantinople, it seems that the posture of affairs which may be called the status quo of uncertainty and doubt remains unchanged. Russia sighs to seize the pear which appears ripe and ready to fall into her rapacious grasp, but yet hesitates to do so in the presence of the British Ambassador, who, true to the interests of the Porte, says, "touch it if you dare." Prince Menschikoff accordingly lowers the haughtiness of his tone, but does not the less laboriously strive to carry his own ends by covert and underhand means. It is hoped and believed that his sinister designs will be successfully thwarted by the sagacity and firmness of Lord Redeliffs.
