A HYMN FOR LENT.

In temptation's dark distress, Lead us through the wilderness, In the way Thine own feet trod, Bleeding, tempted, up to God. Waiting, trembling and afraid, On the mount where Jesus prayed, Teach our humbled souls to share Thirst and pain, and midnight prayer.

Hand that breaks that bruised reed. Save us who are sore indeed ! Voice that hushed the sea to peace, Bid our restless strivings cease. Eyes that 'neath their thorny crown, From the cross looked pitying down, Look on us in mercy sweet, Waiting at Thy blood-stained feet.

Waiting, with our sin and loss, In the dust beneath the cross, Bleeding heart and hands and head, All Thy drops for us were shed. And our sin makes all the gloom Of Thy dreary, rock-hewn tomb, Yet our tears that fall like rain. Soothe no wound and wash no stain.

O, forgive us, Heart of grace, Lift our eyes up to Thy face ! Let the love that makes us free, Smile e'en through Thine agony. Let our sin, our shame, our pride In Thy death, be crucified : And our lives of love and praise Bless Thee e'en for Lenten days.

Dr. Low's Worm Syrup pleasant to take, is always effectual, and as it carries its own Cathartic, there is no need of giving Castor Oil or any purgative afterwards.

On the day following that upon which Loser had so sudderly re-appeared, Mr. Meunier had gone into La Grange, to acquaint the venerable Father under whose bospitable roof Father Montmonlin's mother and sister had found a home with the joyful intelligence that weir friend's character would now be cleared of reproach in the sight of all men. The old priest called his housekeeper, Mrs. Jardinser, and communicated to her the gladsome tidings; then they both went to her mother's room to prepare her to bear the good news. But before they could speak, the delight that beamed from their countenances apprised the old lady that something pleasant was to be appounced to her, and her maternal affection quickly divined the message they were to bring, for what else could give her joy but good news about her son, of whom she thought day and night, for whose elease she prayed day and night?

You have come to tell me some news about Francis?" were the words wherewith she greeted them. "Yes, mother, the best news you can imagine," her daughter replied. " Has his innocence been proved at last?" she asked, pale and agitated.

"You have guessed aright," Mr. Meunier answered. "The real murderer has given himself up to justice. And what is more, not only is your son's innocence fully and firmly established, but every one will now see that he was a martyr to duty, a victim to the seal of confession."

AT HOME AGAIN. On the morning of the next day Loser repeated his self accusation in presence of the Public Prosecutor and his deposition was sent in to the Minister of Justice the same day. A cablegram was forthwith sent to the Governor of Port-de-France, or dering him immediately to strike number 5,348, Francis Montmoulin by name, off the roll of convicte, and send him, as a first-class passenger by the next ship that was sailing for France. He was wanted to appear at a new trial, since the real perpetrator of the crime for which he bad been wrongly condemned had given himself up to justice The message did not reach the Governor of New Caledonia for about a fortnight, as no steamer was leaving Brisbane for Port-de-France until some days after its arrival. The orders it contained were forwarded without delay to the commandant of the island; but number 5.348 was hundreds of miles away, at work in ern division of the larger island, A coasting vessel was at once despatch-vent. There she had an opportunity the copper mines in the north-wested to bear the joyful tidings to the convict, but several weeks elapsed before Father Montmoulin learned that he was to retarn to his country, and that the restitution of his good name, of his liberty, of the right to exercise his escerdotal functions was in store for him. He could hardly believe this to be true when he heard it; he sat down and oried like, obild for very joy of heart. The Superior and some of the Mariat Fathers from the mission at Balaad, as soon as the news reached them, hastened to congratulate the priset, of whose presence among the convicts they had till then been ignorant, on his release and the vindication of his innocence. They brought with them a cassock, in order that he might exchange the conwict's garb for a more befitting habiliment. With feelings of the deep est gratitude to Almighty God. Father Montmoulin epas more rut on the clerical garment, and repaired to the simple little mission chapel, to offer the Holy Sacrifice for the first time in three years. The good Marist Fathers sympathized in his joy, and the native convicte, to whom they explained, as well as they could the severe trial that the holy mar had undergone, pressed round him to kiss the hands that were i ardened by toilsome labor, and to ask for his bl ssing. And then, accomparied by the good wishes and prayers of missioners and convicts, he set out on the long long voyage homeward. o er a wide stretch of the Pacific. ever the Indian Ocean, through the Red Sas.
