"America's Kitchener."

Mr. Justice Hughes's Rise to Fame.
"I believe in work, hard work and long hours of work. I notice, too, that the most successful men are those whose minds are always cool; who are able to deliberate coolly and pronounce a calm, sober judgment in disturbing circumstances. It is not the men who reach the corner first who win, but the man who knows exactly what he is going to do when he reaches the corner."

Such are the views, regarding the qualities which make for success, held by Mr. Charles Evans Hughes, who has been nominated as the Republican candidate for the Presidency of the United States.
He has been described as "the Kitchener of American legal and political life," notably on account of his sphinx-like character and honesty and integrity of purpose.

Gallant little Wales has more than a passing interest in Mr. Hughes, for this brilliant lawyer politician, who has been twice Governor of New York, is a product of Monmouthshire. His father was a Welsh Baptist minister, but Mr. Hughes was born at Glens Fall, in the State of New York, fifty-four years ago.

At first it was intended that he should follow his father's example and become a minister, for when Charles was as young as seven he frequently wrote articles on religious subjects and submitted them for his father's approval. The latter has told how they discussed theological matters together.

But a change came over the boy's inclinations and ambitions when he developed a great passion for mathematics, a passion which influenced him in his ultimate choice of the profession of the law.

Mr. Hughes confesses, however, that he owes almost everything to his mother, who was a Miss Conolly, with Irish, Scottish and Dutch blood in her veins. She was who took him in hand and taught him the lessons of his first years, while his father instructed him in Latin and Greek, for Charles had a strong antipathy to school.

At five years of age he was anxious to go, and his wishes were complied with. Two weeks later, however, he walked into his father's study and handed him a paper, on which he had written, "Charles E. Hughes's plan of study." His father asked him what this meant.

"Father," said Charles, "I don't want to go to school any more. The scholars are very slow in getting through their lessons, and the teacher goes over the same old thing time after time. I would like to study at home with you and mother, and I am sure I should have more time to play."

And for six years Charles studied at home. Ultimately he entered the Brown University, where he graduated.

Afer studying for the law, Mr. Hughes became a junior partner in one of the most famous law firms in New York. His great chance came when in 1905 he "was appointed as senior counsel by the committee to investigate the gas and electric lighting business of New York. The result of his cross-examination was the complete exposure of methods whereby the people were being grossly misled. The legislation which followed was drafted by Mr. Hughes himself, with the result that in the first year the municipality saved on its own lighting alone an amount estimated at £155,000.

That case was the making of Hughes. He became known as the implacable foe of corrupt "bosses" and "rings" and the champion of all good citizenship, with the result that New York insisted on electing him Governor in 1906 and again in 1910.

Personally Mr. Hughes is a man of powerful physique and of great physical and mental energy, who, because of his un-American habit of retaining his beard and moustache, is popularly known as "Whiskers."

He is a man of dry humour. When he was first candidate for the New York Governorship he drew the line at some of the labour usually expected of candidates for office. When confronted with the duty of kissing babies, he flatly declined. "No, I will not make any appeal to the passions of the populace," was his droll refusal.

Mr. Hughes firmly believes in the simple and regular life and the maximum healthy body ensures a steady mind. Walking, golf, and mountaineering are his three hobbies, and when unable to indulge in these outdoor recreations he retires to his library, and finds solace in his beloved books.
