TRINITY.

Some years ago I was awarded the Free Press Christmas Prize for the best historical and descriptive sketch of a Churchyard in Newfoundland. The Churchyard selected and described by me was, of course, that of old St. Paul's, Trinity. In that article I called attention to several deeply interesting things that had been, and that were at the time, associated with that hallowed spot. Since then in my press reports from Trinity, I have frequently referred to other details of interest, hitherto omitted in references to it. Canon Smith, often mentioned historical events, data, etc., such as he alone could produce from his well stored memory. There is, however, one grave in this churchyard, which though worthy of attention has (so far as I know) never been brought to the notice of the public. This grave, though "unmarked," the body of one man, is marked by two stones, one at the head, and one at the foot of the grave.

The one at the foot is not a small marker with initials such as is often supplied by the stone cutter to indicate that end of the grave; but it is in every respect what is known as a "headstone." It is the same height and width as the stone at the head of the grave, and bears the full inscription of name, date of death, and age, such as are on the headstone. It has always been referred to by the few people who have known about it, as "the grave with two headstones," though of course, one is a footstone. The only difference between them is—there is a verse on the headstone, but none on the footstone. Each stone is three feet high, and two feet wide. The full inscription is: "To the memory of William Bugden, who departed this life October 12th, 1808, aged 58 years." The epitaph is: "Ye gentle mourners now your grief forbear. Weep not for him who needs eth not a tear. For though his body's buried in cold clay. Transparent brightness shall his soul display. A husband kind, a parent dear, Near to his God, and to his friends most free. On worldly toys he placed no great regard. He's gone to heaven to meet his just reward."

Now up to this point there is nothing very striking about it all, except that it is a story of a grave with two "headstones." When, however, we ask, why the two stones were ordered, and placed in those positions, then it becomes somewhat interesting. There are two explanations given. One of them I have known for years. It is, that the first stone was ordered from Poole, England, but as it did not come to hand for a long time after it was due, the widow decided that it had gone to the bottom of the sea. So she ordered another. After the second was ordered, the first turned up, and in due time the second came. The other explanation being more romantic, appeals to me. This explanation was given to me a few days ago by a great-grandson of the late William Bugden, who got it from his father, when he—the great-grandson—was a boy. It is this: When Mr. Bugden died, his widow ordered a stone from Poole, which she stipulated was to be "black and white." In due time the stone was received, and was found to be literally as ordered—the stone was black and the letters were white. It was placed in position at the head of the grave, and it was regarded by everybody (but Mrs. Bugden) as a curiosity. People began to make jokes about it, which came to Mrs. Bugden's ears, and then she was sorry that she had ordered such a stone. She, however, was equal to the occasion, so she ordered another stone to be—just "black and white" but "white and black." In due time the stone came—a white stone with black letters. As the first stone had been securely erected at the head of the grave, the second was placed at the foot, and there, facing each other they have kept watch and ward for one hundred and twelve years, and are doing duty to-day in good condition, with the inscriptions fairly legible. Whilst on the subject of headstones, I mention the fact, that I found a stone last week in the old churchyard, with the date 1744. I had always thought that the stone bearing the date 1747 was the oldest.

Bugden, 1776. John Bugden, Jun., of Christ Church, Hants, England, married to Sarah Beston, daughter of Bernard and Martha Beston, of English Harbour. This, I presume, is the beginning of the Bugdens in English Harbour. A son was born to them in 1773, and baptized John. There is another entry in the Burial Register as follows: March 12th, 1773. Interred James Bugden, of Christ Church, Hants, England, aged 59 years. I think he was a brother of John Bugden, Jr.

Re William Bugden, whose grave is marked by two "headstones," there are two entries in the old Register. One, "October 17th, 1776. William Bugden married to Mary Verge." They had a family of nine children—six sons and three daughters; the eldest was born in 1775, and the youngest in 1793. All are carefully registered, and their names were: "Betty, William, Joseph, Thomas, Susannah, Dinah, James, Benjamin." The other entry is: "October 16th, 1808. Interred Mr. William Bugden, of this Harbour, Planter, aged 58 years."

In Garland's time in Trinity, any one in the employ who needed a special suit of clothes, had the "order" sent by the last vessel that went to Poole in the fall, and it came out by the first vessel in the spring. As they were making up the order one fall, old Davy Bailey came in the office. The clerk asked him if he wanted a new suit. At first he said: "Not for though he was worth a good deal of money, he was very saving over it. At last he said: 'Well, you may order one for me but it must be a cheap one.' So the order went—'one cheap coat for Davy Bailey,' and in the spring it came out with the others. It was made of good material, for all material was good in those days—but it had no lining in it, nor any buttons on it; it was a cheap coat all right."

The school closed on June 14th.

The man who asked for "Davy Long's" pills when he wanted Davis and Lawrence's; and the man who decided to take the paint for inside work, because he wanted to use it on the inside of the church-yard fence, did not exhaust the number of those people who say funny things without knowing it; for another man went to the same shop last week and asked for a bottle of elderdown. Tells How

New York—"The woman who neglects to beautify her face and arms (now that they are in vogue) has only herself to blame if she is passed by in the street. It only requires a few minutes each day to make her arms beautiful and graceful. They become dark and rough matter how often they are washed. No covering to protect them. This combination is partly the hands and arms, and try it once you will never be satisfied. Just make this willow on one hand and compare it with the other. You will need no further argument to convince you that this is the best way to make your arms and the shoulders look like three shades whiter. Use white cream on the arms and the shoulders. You tomed to for the sample.
