Even before its terms were made public they were denouncing it without reserve. The Hon. Adam Beck stepped outside his sphere to attack it in a speech a week before he could possibly know what it contained. The local Conservative organ also assailed It in strong language. Here are some of the organ's criticisms:

"Nothing in the treaty compensates for the ruin of the grapegrowing industry of Western Ontario and the Niagara Peninsula. After a long struggle to get upon its feet, it receives a stab in the back at the hands of the Dominion Government"

THE FUTURE OF LIBERALISM. Progressive members of the Liberal party in Great Britain sound the warning that British Liberalism will be crushed between Toryism, which is reaction, and Socialism, which is revolution, unless it can offer a programme of constructive social reform. This has been the keynote of a series of remarkable addresses by Mr. Winston Churchill, the ablest and most aggressive of the young Liberal leaders, with the possible exception of Mr. Lloyd-George. The condition-ofthe-people question occupies most of the arena of political interest, and upon it, for the next generation, elections will be fought.

The British Protectionists promise steady and secure employment by the exclusion of foreign goods which, they argue, displace British labor. There is the fear that protection might strike an irreparable blow at the gigantic export trade of the country, which is balanced on the narrowest margin of profit. Socialism, it is feared, would paralyze the energy and ambition which alone have been adequate to build up and maintain British commercial supremacy.

Between these two extremes Mr. Churchill offers the programme of a Minimum Standard. He would build a platform above the abyss, below which no human being should be permitted to descend, and to which level he would compel the state to hoist all the forlorn multitudes who today endure existence beneath. The London Nation thus defines Mr. Churchill's conception:

"It will demand the definite raising of the minimum. It may require father? large reforms, emphatic revolutionary changes in the life of the accumulated proletariat of the earth If it will guarantee organization of show. the unemployed, and work (to the minimum standard of remuneration) for the unemployed, it will also necessitate some drastic means of dealing with those who decline work, and some redemptive methods for those who are unable to give back to the nation the value of their money. It will accept as part of its programme minumum rates of renauneration, fixed by law; a minimum standard of accommodation in the homes, which are the growingwith large development of state enterprise in the utilization of socalled surplus labor, in the training of children and 'young persons' it will leave all the possibilities of

After the assassination of President McKinley there was a loud call for legislation dealing with anarchists. Some of the propositions made were extreme; others were necessary.
