been unfortunate; so have hundreds and thousands of other men in these hard times. Roger showed me an estimate, cut from a newspaper, of how many had failed during the last two or three years—why it was an army of men. We ain't alone in our troubles, and Roger said that those who cut old acquaintances because they had been unfortunate were contemptible snobs, and the sooner they were found out the better; and I want to find out my score or two of very dear friends who have eaten ice-cream at our house. I hope I may have a chance to wait on 'em. I'll do it with the air of a princess," she concluded, assuming a preternatural dignity, "and if they put on airs I'll raise the price of the goods, and tell them that since they are so much above other people they ought to pay double price for everything. I don't believe they'll all turn up their noses at me," she added, after a moment, her face becoming wistful and gentle in its expression as she recalled some favorites whose whispered confidences and vows of eternal friendship seemed too recent to be meaningless and empty.

The poor child would soon learn that, although school girls' vows are rarely false, they are usually as fragile and transient as harebells. She had dropped into a differ

"Yes, sir."

"Yes, sir, but I was sure that if I saw wisces here, also, did he not?"

"Yes, sir, but I was sure that if I saw you I would obtain my wish. There's a life and snap about this place that I didn't see elsewhere, and therefore I knew a live man, and the sone that the series of a lide at sure of the goods, and tell them that since they are so much above other people they ought to pay double price for everything. I don't believe they'll all turn up their noses at me," she added, after a moment, her face becoming a lady?" asked Belle indignantly.

My our are exceedingly flattering," said the man, with another and I like yours over the season at all the others, were you not?"

"You are exceedingly flattering," said the man, with another and I like yours wisses

Because I'm not a shop-girl, and never have been one. I've often bought goods with my mother in this very store, and of the steers at the courage was not Belle's natural and uncalculating interplidity. She would go wherever duty required her presence, she would scarribce herself for those the loved, and she was capable of martyrdom for a faith about as free from doctrinal abstractions as at he simple allegiance of he sisters of the state of th she had resolved on different tactics.

At last the man lifted his head in his quick, imperious way, asking as he turned toward her, "What is your business with me, madam?"

"I like your store very much," Belle remarked quietly.

Mr. Schriven now really glanced at her, and he found her brilliant black eyes and fair flushed face such pleasing objects of contemplation that he was content to look for a moment while he puzzled a little over the unexpected apparition. He then smiled satirically and said, "What follows from so momentous a fact?"

"It follows that I would rather be em-

The poor child would soon learn that, although school girls' vows are rarely false, they are usually as fragile and transient as harebells. She had dropped into a different world, and the old one would fade like a receding star. She would soon find that her only choice must be to make new associations and friendships and find new pleasures; and this her mercurial, frank and fearless nature would incline her to do very promptly.

With Mildred it was different. The old life was almost essential to her, and it contained everything that her heart most craved.

"And why not now?"

"Because I'm not a shop-girl, and never have been one. I've often bought goods with my mother in this very store, and I come from as good blood as there is in the south. A few months ago my social position was as good as yours, and now that we have been unfortunate and I must work, I see no presumption in asking you to your face for honest work."

"Not at all, my dear young lady," re-little company last spring. I wish you could find something to do that would be quiet and secluded."

"Oh, nonsense:!" cried Belle impatiently. "We can't hide like bears that go into hollew trees and suck their paws for half a dozen years, more or less"—Belle's zoological ideas were startling rather for half a dozen years, more or less"—Belle's zoological ideas were startling rather than accurate—"I don't want to hide and cower. Why should we? We've done nothing we need be ashalled of. Father's been unfortunate; so have hundreds and thousands of other men in these hard times.

Roger showed me an estimate, cut from a newspaper of how we've done of the roads of the roads wheat was steady, with receipts of produces on the street was comparatively small to-day, owing to the bad condition of the roads.
