The London Standard, in its recent uterance on the new Camadian iron duties, betrays the antiquated conception which Englishmen early in this century had of the colonies. It has recently been argued in the colonies. It has recently been argued in the colonies of the world that the granting of responsible government in Canada implied the idea of self-government in matters pertaining to trade and commerce. Without this right, it is is only a truism to state, that the continuance of the bond between us and the Mother Country would be very much more imperilled than by having it. Apply the ultimate to which the colonial system was put in the closing years of the eighteenth century to our advanced condition of to-day, and separation with the Mother Country would be an inevitable consequence. English statesmen, however much they may have regretted that the colonies could not be made hewers of wood and drawers of water, recognized thilly the danger of losing such valuable allies in peace or war by a continuation of exploded theories. They granted what coulding be pointed out that it is no part of the clanada as a means of developing dormant and latent resources, and through this the belighting up of a nation to be a valuable ally a correct of the struction and an and latent resources, and through this the belighting up of a nation to be a valuable ally a correct of the struction and allower the control of the contro

The Globe's next happy thought is that the MtP. having failed—so it claims—to better the price of Canadian wheat, the way to reach that end is to flood Canada with the cheap products of the teeming American West and Northwest. This conclusive argument is not so original as the one first quoted. In fact it is rather antique, having aided in defeating the Grits in 1878. Nevertheless it solves the second of the close of the content of the close of the content of the close of the content of the content of the country.
