

Transcendants. I think the Siberian too small to be worth cultivating. The currants yielded small crops only for several years, but last year did well, and so did the gooseberries. I think if the English gooseberry were protected for a season or two until they got well rooted and were kept clear of the caterpillar, they would succeed. This is the country for strawberries. I have seen finer here than I ever saw before. My present favorites are the Sharpless, perfectly hardy, I give it no protection; and the Bidwell. In 1879½ I planted the first six plants of the Sharpless; in 1881 I sent a small basket of them to the Toronto [Horticultural Exhibition and received first prizes from, I am told, about forty competitors. The raspberries were planted in the fence panels and neglected, but I transplanted some to beds and find they pay well for cultivation. The sorts are Franconia and Brinkle's Orange, Shaffer's Colossal, &c.

I think my ignorance of the nature
