

of scholarship?—simple and direct as a plain, everyday business man; a believer in the homely ethics of daily life, and yet on fire with a gospel of salvation by Jesus Christ and renewal by the Holy Spirit of God. He says himself of preaching, "The more direct and simple the style, and the more rich and real the spiritual experience of the preacher, the more people welcome the message." The sermons of this volume answer to that true note. Many of them have been preached at the Thursday noon service in the City Temple. All of them savor of the work-a-day world. Here is a man who is in the world, knows it, admires its strong points, sees and rebukes its weakness; above all things, seeks to bring the whole of life, even to its small details, under the influences of a Spirit-filled heart. The topics—there are twenty-three sermons in all—cover a wide range, from such questions as, What is God? What is Man? Can God Answer Prayer? to the discussion of Conscience in Common Life, Christianity and the Social Order, Vision and Service. It is not always, indeed, not often, that even good sermons read well. Mr. Campbell's have that rare merit, and the volume will find many readers both within and outside of the ranks of the ministry.

The Martyr Graves of Scotland. By J. H. Thompson; Edited by Matthew Hutchison, with an introduction by D. Hay Fleming, LL.D.; freely illustrated. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 514 pages; $2.50.

We have here a new and revised edition of a well known and valuable work on Scottish Martyrology, a subject of perennial interest, in that it is the record of the sufferings of heroes. The author gave a lifetime largely to a study of the martyr periods and localities, and the lives and testimony of the martyrs themselves. His knowledge of localities and of the details which give life to the narrative, is minute and varied. The book is neither gloomy nor dull, and its stories of steadfastness for principle, to the death, will put the iron into the blood, which these times so much require.

A Young Man's Questions. By Robert E. Speer. Fleming H. Revell Co., Toronto. 223 pages; 80c. net.

A young man is bound to ask questions. He is new to life. Life is new to him. The more of a man he is, the more anxious will he be to make of life, and get out of life, all that is in it; and therefore the more anxious will he be to settle wisely and early the problems which are forced upon him as a young man from all sides. Mr. Speer is competent to speak. A manly man in every fibre, his very style, so fresh and direct, breeds confidence. There is perhaps no young man who has more effectually caught the ear of the young people of this continent. The "Questions" here discussed are thoroughly practical. Why a young man should be a Christian, As to observing Sunday, Shall I drink? As to the Theatre, The young man and money, Men and women, and the volume is one that deserves a place in every Bible class library, and on every young man's book-shelf. Young men will find in it at least some questions settled.
