

SCHOOLS.

As it is important that suitable Schools for the right education of our youth should be established, all are advised to cherish a liberal disposition, and to make such provision as may encourage well-qualified persons to engage in this responsible employment. For want of teachers of this description there is reason to apprehend that children have sometimes been committed to the care of persons, whose example and influence have betrayed them into principles and habits which have had an injurious effect on them in more advanced life.

Friends should endeavour to procure teachers of our own religious profession, who are not only qualified to instruct the children in school-learning, but to co-operate with the Society in its endeavors to excite in them a love of virtue, and to afford them the good example of a conduct consistent with our principles.

Much care should be exercised in the choice of suitable school-books, and the selection of such as are calculated to direct the susceptible and tender minds of youth in the pursuit of piety and virtue: and it is earnestly advised that the Holy Scriptures be frequently read in our schools.
