PROGRESS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 25. 1900.

Beverley declare it was an impossibility to sit down to tes in her travelling dress. The roads had not been dusty at all, and it seemed to Jean that in any case a true lady would have hesitated to put back a meal in any house at which she was a guest. Jean had her own notions as to what the conduct of a lady should be, and it is to be teared Miss Beverley did not come up to them.

The ball bour asked for lengthened into fully three quarters. Mr Beverley's brow knitted its if as though in displeasure, and even good na tured Farmer Morton was beginning to thread rather motion was beginning to feel impatient. The clock had struck six before Miss Beverley made her appearance; but then it must be admitted ahe looked charming enough to almost compensate for the de-enough to almost compensate for the uc-lay. She was dressed in white—billowy white muslin, with foamy laces; a belt, with a gold clasp in the shape of a butterfly with turquoises for eyes, encircled her waist, and two or three of Jean's lovely Malma-son carnations nestled at her bosom. She looked all airiness and grace, a quite dszeling vision of teminine loveliness. At least, so thought Dr. Philip as he strode into the room, just in time to be in-trodu;ed.

she said. 'Aud they really will cause but little trouble. I imagine Mr. Beverly will profer to live with us; they will not want rooms of their own. The only question is will you mind, Phil ? "That question is easily answered. I don't mind a bit, if you don't. Only, you must be prepared to see me give Miss Beverley a wide berth. I know what fash-ionable young ladies are, and I must con-fees I didn't care very greatly for them.' And thus, simply and naturally, it was settled that Clare Beverley should come to Brasside Farm. none of its inmates dream-ing what havoc she would work in their peaceful, happy lives.

A very dainty loveliness was that of Clare Beverley, a loveliness of the kind which wins its way to masculine hearts with Which wins its way to inscaline nearts with surprising swiftness. Her skin was delicately rosy, like the lining of a sea shell; her eyes were of a witching violet; her mouth—though a fast-idious critic might have found fath with it as too small—was like a half blown crimeon rose. MISS BEVERLEY. Jean, in a pure white dress, and with her lovely hair arranged even more care-fully than usual, was bending over the great strawberry beds, picking the luscious crimson fruit and the fresh green leaves. Mr. Beverley and his niece were to ar-rive that afternoon, and the strawberries were for their tea. Everything else was prepared; the flowers were gathered for Miss Beverley's room; the tea-table was spread; the tea was ready to be made. A tall shadow fell across the strawberry beds.

To see. She looked at Phil with the sweetest, most radiant smile, and with a charming little air of surprise. She certainly had not expected to find anything so congenial to her tastes at Braeside Farm as this young and handsome doctor. Jean, of course, presided at the tea-table, and Clare Beverly was forced to admit that the appointments of the table were such as would not have shamed the firest lady in the land. The damask cloth was of satin smooth-ness, and the driven snow could not have excelled its whiteness; the teapot and cream jug, and sugar basin were of solid silver of Queen Anne's time. The trailing wreaths of white and purple convolvuli were the very prettiest de cors-ations that could have been devised. As for the viands-well, one must go to Jan raised herself, and met the laughing eyes of her cousin. What time will the company be here,

What time will the company be here, Jean P 'Uncle started for the station half-an-hour ago. I *xpect them in about ten minutes.' 'Jeanie, I wish they weren't coming.' 'Do you, Phil P Well, it's too late for that now. But why P' 'Miss Beverley will be a nuisance—al ways in the way. always expecting a fellow to 'play pretty,' I suppose.' 'And why shouldn't a tellow 'play pretty?' said Jean, with a pretence at reproof, though her eyes were smiling. 'I could—to you; but I don't like strang-ers. I'm morally certain this girl is going to turn out a nuisance, Jean. Shield me from her as much as you can.' 'I wonder what she would say if she could hear you. Sir Impertinence P' cried Jean, with a happy little laugh; the next moment abe held her hand up warningly. 'They're here, Phil; I hear wheels.' 'Are they'P Then I'm off. Time enough for me to see them at the teat-table. And away bolted Dr. Phil. Jean made her way to the big, old tash-ioned hall, deliciously cool, and bright with ferns and roses. Farmer Morton's gig had drawn up in 'ront ot the door, and there was alighting

Former han, deficiously cool, and bright with ferns and roses. Farmer Morton's gig had drawn up in front of the door, and there was alighting from it a very lovely and elegant young woman, gowned in pearl gray, with a pale blue toque resting on fluffy, silken masses of pale golden hair. Mr. Beverley had already alighted. He was a tall, thin, aristocratic looking man of nearly seventy, with kind brown eyes and silvery hair and beard. He greeted Jean with almost affection-ate cordiality, Then he turned to his niece, and said— 'Clare, to know Miss Emerson is one of my Jean. my Jean.' "My Jean' was uttered in the softest, most careasing of voices, and at the same time Phil's arm was stealing round the girl's lissom waist. Burwly this was not mere brotherly affec-tion; surely it was that some hing deeper, which Jean longed for with every fibre of her being. " All is Not Gold that which Jean longed for with every fibre of her being. Another moment, and the bliasful hope would have become certainty. His arm was tightening round har waist; he was drawing her so near to him that his monstached lip, as he bent to whisper in her ear, almost touched her cheek. Another moment and he would have said—

Another moment and he would have said— 'Jean, I love you ! Will you be my wile?' But it was not to be. The Fates had written something far different from that, and they had ebosen Clare Beverley as the instrument which ebould carry out their purpose. Just at that critical moment a white hand pusbed aride the branches, and a gay voice said— 'Oh ! Miss Jean, are you here ? and Dr Morton. too I have had such a hunt is r you My uncle has sent me. He wants you to give him another song. Dr. Phil muttered a 'Confound it !' be-neath his breath.

Dr. Fail muttered a "Confound it I" be-neath his breath. Jean's cheeks—ay, and her lips, too— turned a little pale beneath the greatness of her disappointment; but she repressed all other signs. and walked quietly towards the house, seeing clearly that Miss Bever-ley did not intend to relieve them of her presence presence That declaration of love, for which her heart so longed, must wait. Ab. could she have dreamed for how ong !

That night Clare Beverley sat up late in her room to write to her very dearest friend and this is a part of what she said— 'I think I told you, Lillian, that I was go-ing to a country tarmhouse with uncle. Im-agine me in such a place ! Int't it quite too dreadful P I nearly screamed with horror when uncle first proposed it. However, there was no escape. Rich uncles must have their whims humoured, be they never so unreasonable.

so unreasonable. 'Well, I am here, and I must tell you I

The damak cloth was of sain smothers, and the driven snow could not have their whines humaured, be they never excelled its whiteness; the trapot and orean jug, and sugar basin were of solid is liver of Queen Annews; the trapot and present the training wreaths of white and purple convolvul ware the very pretise de corrations that could have been devised. As is of the vinads—well, one must go to a farm house such as that of Brasside to for the vinads—well, one must go to a farm house such as that of Brasside to the is nothing better than a farme now. If boot is Equation is sveine. How ever, that is of little consequence, for the is wildower, and anound unapproached the singent of the sensitions. I should also go the singer and the first part of the sensition. I should be inclined to any dear, if it were not ridiculous, considering her position. I should be inclined to any dear? "Be was a brilliant piyer, and, as be bars. There is a firstion will be asking for a song. "Clare sings but little, the remarked is a very fine voice. Will you oblige any dear? "Jean obeyed at once, with her usens firstion with such a thing a sthat?" "But ever and the target is a noco, with her usens if a stan board the song was concluded by a solution of the remainder of the evening. A voice so rich, so pure, she hand rare. I has a very fine voice. Will you oblige any dear?" Jean obeyed at once, with her usens if a most portioned to far the song was concluded by here to any dear?" The moment of hes along to do so. The sone proposed a walk in the garden, indeed with a turn-up of your imperiment little, is a song "the prevent portiese to the song was concluded by the song to do so. The sone proposed a walk in the garden, the song the song was concluded by a song the song was concluded by a song or the song the song was concluded by the song of the sense proposed as alk in the garden, the weak of a long to be sonthory on the prime song was once and the song was be song was a do song the song was all the song anone the song was and the song w with her graceful unhurried step, dusting the ornaments and arranging great bunches ot roses in antique china bowls. She looked sweetly fair in her pale-blue cotton gown, which in spite of Clare Beverley's aneer as to her not knowing how to dress, set on her nobly rounded figure with an air of grace which many a fashion-able beauty might have tried in vain to rival. rival.

rival. Phil glanced at her from time to time in a half-benisting manner. Should he go in and say to her what he had been meaning to say last night? The opportunity was not a very good one; the servant might at any moment ap-pear to lay the breaktast. Perhaps he had better wait a little long-er.

er. He had quite made up his mind to ask Jean to be his wife, and he was surprised to fud how nervous and embarassed he was now that the time for asking seemed to have really come. He wondered whether Jean did care for him with anything more than a cousinly affection.

affection. He could not be sure, he felt almost afraid to hope. Jean was so calm and dignified, so little won't to show her own deeper feelings lightly. He felt abashed at the thought of ap-resching her as a lower.

He couldn't bear the the thought of ap-proaching her as a lover. He couldn't bear the idea of making him self ridiculous in her eyes, those clear deep hazel eyes, which seemed to have such a wonderful power of looking one through and through.

wonderful power of looking one through and through. I know I'm not half good enough for her,' he thought, with true lover like hu-mility. 'She's fit to be a duchess with her cleverness, and her beauty, and that grand sweet way of hers. But if she could care for me-and dad seems to think she might --I believe I could make her happy. I'd try my level best. anyhow, and nobody could love her better-dear darling Jean ! Thus far he had arrived in his musing when a radiant vision passed out of the hall door, and met his dazzled gaze. Clare Beveley, in a moring dress of white and rose color, all soft muslin, and fluttering ribbons and flimsy laces. It was probably the first 'Paris mode' dress that had ever aired itselt at Braeside Farm, and when seen in conjunction with a dainty, sylph like form, radiant blue eyes, smiling lips, exquisite completion, and shimmering golden hair, it mignt well have a dazzling effect on a young man as unso-phisticated as was Philip Morton. He h-d said he knew what fashionable youny ladies were, hut it the truth must phisticated as was rainp morrou. He h-d said he knew what inshionable youry ladies were, but it the truth must be told, his knowledge of them was large-ly confined to the parks and the Row; act-ual contact with one of the genus was an expansion of that had yet to come.

an contact with one of the genus was an experier ce that had yet to come. Oh, Doctor Morton, you are an early riser like mysel! I Piesse don't move, I wouldn't disturb you for the world, you look so comfortable. What a lovely morn-

Su

Through is With mind us These cold What grace In window And where it

Hush ! Liste A murmur Is bearing sp And now, y

THE CZ

Welcomes E Conver

Exception perial famil here with L mission of visit bas be life. My to ceived as m I was told t ed to see m until a few my wife and to appear a vival of the eued by tok munications

I found th looking not him before 'I was two the other tie

The cares wrinkle on h ince I saw to the throne in stature, is and has blue perfectly ast tion of mann are dominan sonally at pe withstanding clared war a try is always The Empe principles a The Hague. his movemen thinks, as m sults of that He said to m How man pened since 701 SAW 01 mother has sorrows sinc my father, uring the la the Queen of all, and is w but in her ou the Spanish A

He laughe one battle the a mule.

When I r Spain bad rai replied : 'Yes over the nam sea or land, that conflict. Speaking stuffs, sent or Christian Her 'How kind end that help poor countryn was a great m When I re ween our nati talked with h

"The Lord i

This grove

purple a'ta The Nunc l

very bright smile. 'She is a very fine lady, Jean.' 'Is she ? Well we way in a she ? and I don't doubt we shall be able to please her What is she like, uncle? I please her remember you saw her when you went up remember you saw her when you went up to town at Christmas.' 'Wondertully handsome, not haughty at all, but very splendidly dressed, and, I should imagine, very tond of gaiety. It beats me to know how shell amuse herself at Braeside Farm. Well, I'll answer the letter. Am I to say 'Yes,' Jean P' 'Stay one moment, uncle. There's just one thing we were forgetting.' 'What's that, lassie P' 'Phil. I don't think we omeht to say

:0

CHAPTER I JEAN.

You might have searched through a long summer day, and not have found a prettier spot than Braeside Farm. The house was of red briek; but the red had that rich mellowness which only Time can give, and moreover, it was half smoth-ered with ivy. clematis, and great Gloire roses.

roses. It was a very. very old house, dating back to the time of the Tudors, Farmer Morton declared, and certainly its appear-ance well bore out the assertion, for it had great stacks of crooked chimneys, and many gabl s, and the great hearth place in the kitchen was just such a one as might have belonged to the days of Qaeen Bess. The Mortons had held the land from time immemorial.

The Mortons had held the land from time immemorial. They had been gentry in the old days, squires who had owned the goodly acres they farmed, but the troublous times pre-ceding the Common-wealth had changed them from squires to plain yeomen, and now, in these practical days, John Morton was only a farmer, though as good blood as any in England flowed through his veins. The farmhouse kitchen looked delightful-ly cool and pleasant one June day when the farmer entered it, hot and tired from a long walk into town.

long walk into town. Jean, the farmer's nit ce, sat at a table near the window, picking a great pile of ruddy cherries from their stalks and Jean's face was the very loveliest thing about

She looked up from the cherries at the ntrance of her uncle and greeted him with

'Ay, lassie, and a bit bothered too! Read that. I called at the post office when I was in the town. It's from Mr. Beverley.' Jean read the letter slowly. Thus it ran-

Thus it ran-'Dear Mr. Morton.-I have had a pretty sharp attack of illness since I saw you. My doctors insist on my getting away for change of scene and pure country air. Brasside Farm is the only place that I feel I could be at home in. We should not quarrel as to terms, and I promise to give as little trouble as possible. I must tell you, however, that I should like my niece to accompany me. I think you know her. 'My kindest regards to Miss Jean. 'Awaiting your reply with some little anxiety.

anxiety. 'I am yours sincerely, 'William Beverley'

WILLIAM BEVERLEY' 'Well, Jean, what do you say P'asked the farmer. 'I don't like refusing the old gentleman, and yet...' 'And yet you don't like the idea of tak-ing lodgers, which it would really amount to,' said Jean, with a grave sweet smile 'I know just how you feel, uncle. But I think Mr. Beverly will have to come. He has such a true regard for you, and was always so kind. You simply couldn't re-fuse him when he asks like that.' 'Yes, that's how I feel about it,' said Farmer Morton, unknitting his brows, and looking much reassured by his niece's sympathy.

sympathy. Mr. William Beverley, a man of easy

Mr. William Beverley, a man of easy fortune, who devoted much of his time to art, had years ago visited Braeside Farm, and tormed a warm regard for its master His home was in Loudon, and, during the last year, a niece, presumably his heir-ess, had made her home with him. 'Mr. Beverley would be little or no trouble,' remarked the farmer, after a minute or so of deep thought. 'It's the young lady I'm afraid ot.' 'Then don't be afraid, uncle. Trust me to manage everything,' said Jean in her calm, decisive manner, and yet with a very bright smile.

Braeside Farm

Pa-

'You're t red. uncle.'

Beautiful Jean.

IN TWO INSTALMENTS.

Jean P'

CHAPTER II.

MISS BEVERLEY.

'Bessie can do everything of that kind,'

Then he turned to his niece, and said— 'Clare, to know Miss Emerson is one of the pleasures coming to Braeside Farm.' A little grey gloved hand was put into Jean's and the sweetest of voices murmur-d how pleased Miss Beverley was to meet Miss Emerson. 'You will like to go up to your room at once?' said Jean, with the air of simple dignity which sat so well upon her. 'Please let me show you the way.' 'Thank you so much,' murmured Miss Beverley, tollowing Jean up the wide oak staircase, while Farmer Morton took charge of her uncle. It was a lovely old room Jean had pre-pared for her guest—a room with casement windows and a southern aspect, commandlows and a sou thern aspect.

windows and a southern aspect, command-ing a magnificent view of the hills from which the farm took its name. All within was purity and order, from the white curtained bed to the pincushion where the pins formed the words 'Welcome to Brasside Farm ' 'How sweet !' said Miss Beverley, sink-ing into a downy chair, and daintily saifing at the roses and carnations on the dressing table. 'How perfectly charming ! Such a change after London, Miss Emerson.'

Change after London, Miss Emerson.' Inwardly she was bewailing the absence any full length mirror, and she was wonder ing how on earth she should manage with out one-wondering, too, how she should bear the solitude of this country farmhouse. 'Can I d anything for you?' asked Jean with gentle courtes.

of the room. It seemed to her that it was only an af fectation of fine ladyism which made Miss other, she found herselt to her obagrin, between her uncle and the tarmer, and, in a distant shubbery, she could see Phil's tall figure beside Jean's white gown. Jean had felt a little dispirited almost without knowing why, and she had stolen away to the shrubbery to indulge her sad thoughts in solitude.

away to the shrubbery to indulge her sad thoughts in solitude. Her heart leapt with sudden trembling joy when she heard a well-known step be-hind her, and an equally well known voice whisperins in her ear.— "Why, Jeanie, are you here, dear ? I've been hunting everywhere for you." He drew her arm through his, and pres sed it tenderly. But was it the mere affectionate tender-ness of a cousin who has learned to icel as a brother towards a girl who has lived beneath his iather's roof for years, or was it the deepest tenderness of all ? That was what Jean wanted to know; that is severley? asked Phil, with the free-dom of perfect smypathy and confidence. "Well, Jean, and what do yon think of Miss Beverley? asked Phil, with the free-dom of perfect smypathy and confidence. "She is very protty—beaultiful almost," said honest Jean; 'but—but I'm atraid I shall not like her. I think she is selfish and not quite true." "By Jovel I believe you're right, Jeanie. She somehow gave me that impression, too, in spite of her wonderful prettiness— and she is pretty I must admit that. But to you know, I don't like her way with you at all; it's a deuced sight too patronising. I can't bear to see anyone showing that sort of manner to should think so much of herselt. Farmer Morton says her father was a gentleman, but she hasn't a penny of fortune. It will take her pride down a little to find she can't keep her lover. She's welcome to him when I've done with him-not before. 'Good-bye, dear Lilian. I shall let you know how my little firitation progresses. Wish me good luck in it! 'Yours forever and a day, 'CLARE BEVERLEY.'

CHAPTER III

THE BEGINNING OF THE FLIRTATION.

The BEGINNING OF THE FLIRTATION. The next morning, Dr. Phil was on the lawn, smoking an early cigar, and refresh ing bimselt further with an occasional snift at the rosee which bloomed in such glorious abundance at Braseide Farm. Through the open windows of the break-fast room he could see Jean moving about raising his straw hat, and replying to Miss Beverley's gushing enthusiasm with all courtesy. 'I do believe they are making hay quite close to us,' she exclaimed. 'Yes, I de-clare they are. Oh, I must go and see them; there's nothing on earth I love so Allow me to take you,' said Dr. Phil, and away they went together.

To reach the hay field they had to pass through the orchard and garden; they also had to climb a very awkward stile.
Stiles are proverbially dangerous things.
When Phil took Clare Beverley's little hand in his, and saw her lustrous violet eyes looking down upon him with the sweetest, most bewitching smile, he was conscious of a distinct thrill of pleasure, and it occurred to him to wonder that he had not noticed before how very beautiful she was.

the was. Certainly he had never seen such an ex-quisitely fair complexion, such lovely blue eyes, or such shimmering golden hair. Up and down they walked along the sevent such as the sevent set of a sevent sevent set of a sev

(CONTINUED ON FIFTEENTE PAGE.)

that Russia ha during our Ci 'Ob, yes; n our Rn our Russian f York and San foreign enemie The Empere

our coming H which candida I do not say. to answer all t ered upon me concerning this the royal pres one by his fath zene, the Russi who telegraphe had a present and so I was to a Bussian war to receive the g

Everything peror a long d dmired of all ment that will