Of course we were friends at once, and the daisy-faced enchantress made room for me beside her, "lest," as she said, "some horrid, disagreeable creature, should crowd in and bore her to death," and I stepped right out of the musty, ill-ventilated world of the railway carriage into an atmosphere of Eden.

"Is it possible?" lisped the widow.
And I mentally shook hands with myself for having thus deftly put a spoke in Bob's wheel."

First impressions are everything, and I certainly had been beforehand with the pretty widow. Neither had I any compunctions of conscience, for hadn't Bob been playing practical jokes of all styles and complexions on me ever since we had entered the bar side by side?

"Stupid Tom" had been his pet name with me, always; but this wasn't so very "stupid" a game, after all.

While I was thus metaphorically hugging myself, the conductor bawled out, "Glendale," and I sprang up to assist my lovely companion out of the car, cheer fully burdening himself with bags, baskets, parasols and bulky wraps.

As we stepped upon the platform, I nearly tumbled into the arms of—Bob Carter.

"Hullo, Tom!" was his inelegant greeting. "You don't grow any lighter as you grow older."

I was about to retort, bitterly, when a sudden change came over his face, as he beheld the pretty widow behind me.

"Gertie," he exclaimed, clasping both her hands in his.

"Yes, Robert," she answered, with sparkling eyes and flushed cheeks, "That gentleman has got my parcels; he has been very kind to me."

"Oh, has he, though?" Well, we won't trouble him any further. I am much obliged to you, Tom, and we'll send you cards to the wedding."

"To what wedding?" I gasped.

"Didn't you tell him, Gertie? Why, to our wedding, the tenth of next month, to be sure. Au revoir. Tom, be careful of yourself for my sake."

And that was the last I ever saw of my daisy-faced widow. For if you think I was meanspirited enough to go to that wedding, you are mistaken in my character.

She loved the opera—so did I. She thought this woman's suffrage movement all ridiculous—with a bewitching little lisp on the syllable I agreed with her.

She thought the true woman's sphere was home; my feelings surged up too strongly for utterance. I merely bowed my assent. What would Bob say when he saw this beautiful little robin lured into my cage!

How I would lord it over him. How I would invite him to "happen in at any time." How I would—figuratively, or course—hold up Mrs. Thomas Smith over his envying head. I uttered an audible chuckle as I thought of these things, which I had some difficulty in changing into a cough.
