There is comfort for the man with a preliminary only hand in the House of Commons, on Laurier's want of confidence.

Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat closed his remarks with one of those prophecies which we have heard on so many occasions from the other side of the House, namely if we could only have this House dissolved once more that would be the end of the Conservative party. It is not the first time that we have heard speeches of that kind not only in this House but throughout the length and breadth of the land. In fact, gentlemen on the other side have on more than one occasion directed themselves to the extent that even after a general election was all over, when we have heard the hon. gentleman say that a majority of 50, they claimed for themselves a majority of two. (Laughter.) I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman in that portion of his speech. He opened his remarks, however, by stating that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had, in the course of the observations that he had addressed to this House sought to make capital out of the memory of the late great leader of the Conservative party. There is no need for any man who has followed that great leader in the past to seek and make capital out of his memory. That memory, the spirit of that great man is in this land.

of the House (cheers). Now that main object of the motion we are now debating is, as has already been said, to cause a feeling of discontent, to create dissension among a people who have chosen Canada as their home I say so advisedly. I do not hesitate to state that the motion which is brought before the House has no other purpose than that of creating in the minds of the Dominion the belief that the hon. Minister of Justice was deprived of the position of Prime Minister of Canada on account of his religious persuasion. That has been stated very openly, that it might go abroad among the co-religionists of that hon. gentleman; but I am here to state that I am convicted from my own soul that there is not one word of truth in the charge (cheers). There is not one man in this House who mingles more in all sections of the members, or who is more intimate with the members on the Conservative side of the Chamber than I am, and I can truthfully say that from one and all, from the moment that the great chief was laid low, from the moment the old grand man has passed away, there was

But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, like any other man, has his own views on the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway had been resigned by the hon. leader of this Government, and he has since then only a day or two ago in order the better to qualify himself for the position which he holds, and one honorable gentleman on the other side went so far as to say that even if Mr. Abbott still held that stock he would respect him more than because he disposed of it. We all know that it is not to-day that we are to see the hon. leader of this Government cease his connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway as its solicitor. Four years ago, when he was in the city of Montreal to become the first magistrate of that city, he then resigned his position as solicitor of that company, the benefits of which amounted to something like $10,000 a year, and
