oor child. A moment longer, and she fell to the floor.

The next impression Cytherea had any sonsciousness of was of being carried from a strange vehicle across the pavement to the steps of her own house by her brother and an older man. Recollection of what had passed evolved itself an instant later, and just as they entered the door—through which another and sadder burden had been carried but a few instants before—her eyes caught sight of the south-western sky, and, without heeding, saw white sunlight shining in shaft-like lines from a rift in a slatey ploud. Emotions will attach themselves to seenes that are simultaneous—however for legin in essence these scenes may be—as chemical waters will crystallize on twigs and wires. Even after that time any mental agony brought less vividly to Cytherea's mind the scene from the town hall windows than sunlight streaming in shaftlike lines.

$ 4. October the nineteenth.

When death enters a house, an element of sadness and an element of horror accompany it, Sadness, from the death itself; herror, from the clouds of blackness we designedly labor to introduce.

The funeral had taken place. Depressed, yet resolved in his demeanor, Owen Graye sat before his father's private escritoire, engaged in turning out and unfolding a heterogeneous collection of papers—forbidding and inharmonious to the eye at all times—most of all to one under the influence of a great grief. Laminæ of white paper tied with twine were indiscriminately intermixed with other white papers bounded by black edges—these with blue foolscap wrapped round with crude red tape.

The bulk of these bills, letters and other.

The bulk of these bills, letters, and other ocuments were submitted to a careful ex-mination, by which the appended particu-ars were ascertained rs were ascertained.

First, that their father's income from prorestonal sources had been very small, amounting to not more than half their expenditure, and that his own and his wife's property, upon which he had relied for the balance, had been sunk and lost in unwise loans to unscrupulous men, who had traded upon their father's too open-hearted trustfulness.

upon their father's too open-hearted trustfulness.

Second, that finding his mistake, he had endeavored to regain his standing by the illusory path of speculation. The most notable instance of this was the following:
He had been induced, when at Plymouth in the autumn on the previous year, to venturne all his spare capital on the bottomry security of an Italian brig which had put into the harbor in distress. The profit was to be considerable, so was the risk. There turned out to be no security whatever.
The circumstances of the case rendered it the most unfortunate speculation that a man like himself—ignorant on all such matters—could possibly eneage in. The vessel went down, and all Mr. Graye's money ters—could possibly engage in. The vessel went down, and all Mr. Graye's money with it.

Third, that these failures had left him burdened with debts he knew not how to meet; so that at the time of his death even the few pounds lying to his account at the bank were his only in name.

Fourth, the loss of his wife two years earlier had awakened him to a keen sense of his blindness, and of his duty by his children. He had then resolved to reinstate by unflagging seal in the pursuit of his profession, and by no speculation, at least a portion of the little fortune he had let go.

Cytherea was frequently at her brother's elbow during these examinations. She often remarked sadly:

"Poor papa failed to fulfill his good intention for want of time, didn't he, Owen that there was an excuse for his past, though he never would claim it, I never forget that original disheartening blow, and how that from it sprang all the ills of his life—everything connected with his gloom, and the hastinde in business we used so often to see about him."

"I rememeber what he said once," returned the brother, "when I sat up late with him. He said, Owen, don't love too blindly; blindly you will love if you love at all, but a little care is still possible to a grand-aciplined heart. May that heart be our mother."

The love affair which had been Ambrose Graye's disheartening blow was precisely of that nature which lads take little account of, but girls ponder in their hearts.

the ninth.

Thus Ambrose Graye's good intentions with regard to the reintegration of his property had scarcely taken tangible form when his sudden death put them for ever one of his paper.

when his sudden death put them for ever out of his power.

Heavy bills, showing the extent of his obligations, tumbled in immediately upon the heels of the funeral from quarters previously unheard and unthought of. Thus pressed, a bill wasfilled in Chancery, to have the assets, such as they were, administered by the Court.

"What will become of us now," thought Owen continually.

Achethe would be almost priceles and sufficient to the country of the court and the price of the country of the court and the price of the country of the court and the country of the court of the country of the court of the country of the court of the court of the country of the country of the court of the country of the country of the court of the country of the court of the country of the country of the court of the country of the court of the country of the country of the court of the country of the country
