trouble was made deliberately and with a full idea of what would follow its publication. How can the government be censured, they ask, for doing just exactly what Lord Dundonald expected it to do; what he felt would be the inevitable consequence of his action?

Undoubtedly, Lord Dundonald knew when he made that memorable speech that he was signing his own discharge papers. But that was because he knew the ministers with whom he had to deal. He knew their lack of sympathy with the plans for the improvement of the militia; knew their hatred of anything imperialistic; knew that they cared for nothing save themselves and the advantage of their party; knew that they were determined to work the militia-primarily for petty political purposes and knew that any exposure of or protest against their methods would bring swift vengeance.
