ALICE;

A TALE OF RETRIBUTION.

BY THOMAS L. SPENCER, M. D.

CHAPTER I.

Mr. Eaton was seated in an elegantly furnished parlor, in the Village of G——, upon the morning when our story opens, conversing with a blooming young girl, whom he addressed as his daughter, when a servant entered announced a stranger, who desired to see him.

"Show him into the parlor," said Mr. Eaton, in a petulish voice.

The servant retired, and ushered into the room a tall, thick-set man of a dark complexion, and bearing very much the aspect of a villain. As he entered the room, he fastened his dark eyes upon Mr. E., as if to satisfy himself that he was not mistaken. He approached Mr. Eaton, who appeared not to recognize him, and extended his hand.

"I see you do not know me, sir," said he. 'Perhaps your memory will be refreshed by mention of my name, Joseph Johnson, sir,' and as he said this, a malicious smile lit up his countenance, while Mr. Eaton turned as pale as marble. "I happend to be in these parts, and thought I would drop in and have a little private conversation with you.

"Yes," said Mr. Eaton, in a tremulous voice, 'I am happy to see you. Alice, you may retire to your room," said he, turning to the young lady of whom we have spoken. As Alice was retiring, the stranger eyed her keenly, and when she had closed the door, said:—

"You are mighty happy to see me, I guess!"

"Johnston when I parted with you at S——, I hoped that it was for the last time," said Mr. Eaton.

"No doubt of that, sir, none at all, in my mind; but it seems your hopes, like a good many others, were not fated to be met, for I am here before you, the same identical Joseph Johnson, who nineteen years ago, saw you at G——, in the commission of a crime, for which, at this very hour, there is a bounty of $3000 upon your head!" As he said this, he fastened his piercing eyes upon Mr. E., to watch its effect.

"Hist Johnson," said Mr. E., in a nervous voice, —'don't speak so loud, we may be over heard."

'What do I care for that!" said he, as he raised his voice still higher. "I have come to get you, that I may claim the reward! I have spent a year in hunting for you."

"Stop! Johnson,—I will give you anything—everything, but, for God's sake don't expose me."

"Well, that begins to sound like it," said he, lowering his voice. "Now you begin to talk like a man."

"What shall I give you, Johnson!"

"Oh! we'll talk about that by-and-by. By the way, was that your daughter in the room when I came in?"

"It was," said Mr. Eaton.

"You must have been married then very soon after leaving England!"

"Yes, the year after,"

"How old is your daughter?"

"Seventeen years."

'Well, now, I'll tell you what I'll do. I've taken quite a shine to the girl, and if you are a mind to marry me to her, and give me twelve thousand dollars, I'll keep mum."

"Ho! Johnson, that is too hard. I don't know as the girl would consent—she is already betrothed!"

"Well, you can do as you please—these are my terms."

"Why, Johnston, I couldn't get the girl's consent. I'll give you twelve thousand without her."

"You have my terms, and not an inch will move from them. If the girl won't consent, order her; and if she won't obey, why, I'll fix that."

"Johnson, you are really too hard,"

"I can't help that sir; you can say whether you'll do it. Come, what do you say? Time's precious."

"I'll give you twenty thousand."

"No, sir; you have my terms, and you know Joe Johnson won't change. Will you do it, or shall I have you arrested?"

"Well, sir; then let's proceed to business. I must marry the girl within three weeks.'

"What! so soon? We cannot bring matters to a focus in that time without creating suspicion: for I shall have hard work to get the girl's consent—if I can get it at all."

'Well, I'll take care of that. You just tell the girl she must give up her old lover—and leave the rest to me. I'll met you here to-morrow, and you can then introduce me to her. Until then, I'll keep cool," saying which he arose and left the house.

Alice was in her room pondering upon the queer appearance of the stranger, and the effect his presence had upon her father, when he entered the room.

"Father," said Alice, as he came in, "who was that horrible-looking man who was with you in the parlor?"

"He is a friend of mine, whom I have not met for several years. He came to bring me news from England. Alice, George Danforth's visit at our house must be discontinued."

If a thunderbolt had struck Alice, she could not have been more astonished than she was at this message from her father.

"Why, father, what has happened that George Danforth must be banished from my presence?"

"No matter, girl; it is enough that I say he must come here no more!" said Mr. Eaton, in an angry tone.

"Well, father, I am not disposed to yield up George's friendship without a proper cause."

"Beware! girl, how you parley with me. If George Danforth stops his foot over the threshold of my house again, or you receive his visits, I will instantly turn you out, summoning a violent answer from him or both—at the same time leaving the room.

"I think some have occurred to change suddenly the tone of my father's feelings towards George," said Alice to herself, after he had left the room.

"He gave me command to see him no more, and now he forbids me entering his house. What a change, and how inexplicable my father's conduct, and from threatens to use violent words upon him, if he dares to come here. There must be something wrong. I don't like the looks of that stranger. It cannot be that my father——' Here she stopped evidently she dared not lay her suspicions. "I will send George a note, telling him the situation of matters here, and invite him to meet me this evening at the old oak tree, at eight o'clock," saying which she took her pen, and having written a hasty note to George, rang the bell for a servant. A servant appeared.

"Tell Lucy to come up here," said she.

"Yes marm" said the servant, and retired.

In a moment the door opened, and "Lucy," as Alice called her, entered.

"Lucy," said Alice, "can I trust you with a secret mission?"

"Certainly, Miss Alice, I will do anything for you."

"Well then, I wish you to carry this billet to Mr. Danforth, and wait for an answer. Let no one know what you are about. Mind now, and keep secret."

"Certainly, Miss Alice, I will not let my left hand know what my right hand carries."

Alice smiled at the girl's promise, and said—"Well, then, go quick, and be sure that you give it to him and to no one, else." The girl departed, and Alice was again alone.

"This is mysterious," said she. "I cannot unravel it. What can it mean? It may be—but why should I have I have such suspicions of my father? Something is wrong. Perhaps George can unravel it." She continued exercising her brain, to solve the mysterious conduct of her father, until Lucy retentered the room and put into her hands a note from George, containing the simple words, 'I will be there."

"You found him then, Lucy? Did any one else see you?"

"No,"

"I may want your assistance again. You may go now, or you will be missed in the kitchen."

Evening came on, and Alice partook of a light supper, and complaining of a headache, declared her determination to retire. She went to her room, but not to rest. The clock struck eight. Throwing a shawl over her head, she crept noiselessly down the back stairs, and pursued her way cautiously to the old oak, where she found George in waiting.

Alice related the conversation which had passed between herself and father. The visit of the stranger, and from the sudden change of Mr. Eaton's decision in the regard to George, immediately succeeding the advent of the suspicious-looking visitor, left no doubt in their minds that he was the cause of the present revulsion of feeling towards their intercourse.

While thus engaged in consultation, they were alarmed at hearing a sudden crackling in the bushes near by, and fearing that they had been overheard, and deeming it prudent not to prolong the interview, they separated, Alice promising, in a whisper, to meet George on the following evening to report what might take place in the meantime.

CHAPTER II.

At an early hour the next day Johnson called again upon Mr. Eaton, whom he found anxiously awaiting his coming.

"Well, old fellow," said he, as he entered, "I see you have commenced operations with your daughter. Blast me, if I don't believe you are getting to be quite decent man."

"How do you know that I have said anything to her upon the subject?"

"Because I saw the young fellow, who was pointed out to me as her lover, approaching your establishment very cautiously last evening, and I took a fancy to follow him to see what he was about, when I found that he and Miss Alice had a private arrangement for the occasion. She told him you had forbiden his visits—and blast me, if the little jade don't begin to think there is some villainy afloat."

"Where did this happen?"

"Under an old oak tree, a few rods from here."

"What did they say?"

"Oh, they said just what any one would say under the circumstances. They talked about an elopement in case necessity required, and appointed another meeting, this evening, at six o'clock."

"The hussy! She will learn bottes than to disobey my orders."

"Well, now, you see something must be done, immediately, or she will off, and then our game is up."

"Yes, I see; but if we drive matter too fast, people will have suspicions that all ain't right. We have got to play the card shrewdly."

"That is true. The creatures suspected villainy, Alice said she believed I was a rascal, and you too."

"Jade! I will teach her manners. But we must be shrewd, for these country people are mighty suspicious creatures."

"Yes, I know, and I have a plan for the regulation of that. Just leave this Danforth to me. I'll take care of him, and take charge of the girl. Remember that you are to deliver her to me, in three weeks, or the trade is up. Inasmuch as she is not of age, just order her to marry me, and if she refuses, force her. I'll fix it so that people won't blame you. She'll probably stick to her old lover, but I'll put him in such a fix that people will have a mighty poor opinion of him. By the way, what has become of that woman you brought over from England with you?"

"Oh! she's dead, I suppose. Is Lord S—— alive yet?"

"Yes, he was at last accounts. He made a mighty poor trade in swapping wives. I've heard that he is sorry for the matter."

"Ah! he was a villain."

There are a great many villains in the world," said Johnson, giving an ironical tone to his voice By-the-by, just let matters, run easy with the girl, and let her meet her lover at the oak again to-night."

"Well, perhaps that would be advisable."

"We'll have matters all arranged so that we can be safe in performing the marriage ceremony at the stipulated time. But I must be off. I'll see you again to-morrow."

"Won't you wait and see Alice?"

"Well, I don't care if I do."

Mr. Eaton rang the bell and ordered the servant to tell Alice to come into the parlor. They waited for some time, and she did not make her appearance, Johnson concluded that he would wait until the next day. As soon as he was gone, Alice entered the parlor. Mr. E. frowned when she came in, and she prepared herself for a storm.

"Young lady, I am in the habit of having my orders obeyed immediately."

"I obeyed sir, as soon as I could arrange my toilet. I had a bad headache last evening, and have but just arisen."

"I'm said Mr. E., in an ironical voice, "young girls are apt to have headaches when the tide of love don't run smooth enough to suit them. I wish you to distinctly understand that your projected alliance with George Danforth is at an end.'

Father, what can have produced this sudden change in your feelings towards George? Has not his deportment been correct?"

"No matter; it is sufficent that I say he can come to this house no more."

"Why, Father? What has that stranger——"

"He don't you hussy," said Mr. E. in a desperate burst, interrupting Alice. "Don't cast any impudence on my friend."

"I have given no impudence sir here, but I do believe in fact I know that there is some stronger motive for the course you have taken since he came here.

Mr. E., could hardly repress his emotions when he found that Alice really suspected the truth of the matter, and resolving to come at once to the point, he said:—

"Alice, my friend is a man of wealth and influence, and I am determined that inasmuch as he has sued for your hand, he shall have it in marriage."

"Why, father! never, never will I marry that man. He is a villain—I know he is."

'Stop! don't you dare to speak thus of a friend of mine, You must remember, too, that your not yet of age."

"But father, you would not force me to marry him?"

"I shall, if you do not consent."

"Before I will marry him I will die. I am already and by your consent, betrothed to George."

"But George is not worthy of your hand."

"Prove that he is not, and I will marry whomsoever you direct."

"I will do it in less than one week," said he, as he arose and left the room. Alice felt that she had been hasty in making the last remark, for she feared that some scheme might be invented to injure George, and yet she knew that no proof that they could adduce would lower him in her estimation, as she had been intimate with him from childhood.

Mr. Eaton, immediately upon leaving the room sought and found the infamous Johnson, and reported to him what Alice had said in relation to George; and we will leave them concocting their unrighteous scheme, while we view another scene.

CHAPTER III.

In an elegantly furnished parlor on —— street, in London, about three months before the appearrance of Johnson at Mr. Eaton's, reposing on a velvet couch, was a man apparently in the last stage of consumption. A physican stood at his bedside, and they were in consultation upon a matter that evidently was of deep moment to the invalid. The physican, who was examining his pulse, said:—

"I fear that you have not strength to perform the task, without imminently periling your life."

"It maters not. This very hour let a magistrate be called. If I die in its performance, it matters but little. I shall feel easier to go, if I even make the attempt. I cannot go into eternity without freeing my soul of this incubus that weighs it down, and has gnawed upon my conscience for nearly seventeen years. Let a magistrate be called immediately."

"It shall be as you wish," said the physican, and stepping to the bell, called a servant, whom he dispatched him at once for the person required. In a short time a magistrate appeared, and the sick man said;

"Sir, I have called you to take my dying confession of the wrongs that I have inflicted upon my former wife. I wish you to write what I will now say." The magistrate having prepared himself to write, the invalid commenced:—

"Twenty-five years ago I was married to a young lady in Liverpool, by the name of Hall. We removed to this city, and lived very happily together for the space of ten years, when I unfortunately became acquainted with the Countess ——, who with her husband, was in London upon a tour of pleasure. She was a woman of very prepossessing manners and disposition and in our intercourse, there sprang up between us a strong passion, which we resolved to gratify at some rate. There were two obstacles in the way of the enjoyment of our unholy desires. My wife and the countess' husband must be disposed of.

"A year rolled away, and nothing definite had been done towards the consummation of our desires. My wife had given birth to a daughter, which, instead of binding me more closely to her, as it should have done, but increased a plan of operation. She induced her husband, who had grown jealous of me, to leave town for a few, weeks, and I, in the meantime, employed a desperate character by the name of Walters to follow and assassinate him. This act he succeded in accomplishing, on the third day after his arrival in S——.

"The news of the murder was soon brough to London, and I rejoiced (villain that I was) that one obstacle was removed. Suspicion was fastened upon a young American in S——, and upon the testimony of Walters, he was convicted and executed.

"My wife must now be disposed of; and after having exercised my brain for an expedient, I finally hit upon one that worked admirably. As soon as she became sufficiently strong, the physician (who was bribed by me) advised a journey and frequent excursions upon the water, as the readiest means of regaining her health. Accordingly, we left London, accompanied by Walters, whom I had employed as a servant, and took up our residence in a country town, where we soon carried into execution my scheme.

"One morning we went out upon a little obscure lake to take a short boat ride, when this Walters rowed the boat to the opposite shore, and himself and my wife were left there while I rowed the boat back. When near the shore, I capsized it, swam to land, and went to the manor where we had boarded, and informed the people that my wife, child, and servant were drowned. The people round about assembled, and the lake was dragged for the bodies, but they were not to be found, and it was concluded that they had sunk in a deep locality, and that they must there remain.

"I appeared to mourn the loss of my wife deeply, and people had not the slightest suspicion that my sorrow was not real. Walters, in the meantime, took my wife and child on board a vessel, the captain of which I bribed, and sailed for America, and in a year I was married to the countess. She, several years ago, died of delirium tremens.

"Walters went to the United States, where he changed his name, and putting my wife under the direction of a villain in one of the Southern States, took my child and removed to a town in New Jersey, where he now resides.

"Whether my wife is now alive or not, I do not know; but my child is, and it is my earnest prayer that she may be found, and that villain Walters be brought to justice. A year ago, Walters was in New Jersey. I am weak," said the invalid, "give me some wine."

"How should we be able to recognize the child, in case the natural find it?" said the magistrate.

"By the mark on the right arm."

At this moment a servant entered and announced the arrival of a stranger, who desired to see him.

"Who is she?" inquired he.

"I don't know. She looks like a crazy woman."

"Tell her that she cannot come in."

At this moment a noise was heard upon the stairway, as of a struggle with the servants; the physician opened the door, when a singular looking woman madly pushed in, and running up to the bed, posted herself directly in front of the dying man.

"Sir!" said she, pointing her long, bony finger at him, her eyes at the same time dilating under the most intense excitement, "I have come in season to see you die. Infamous wretch, behold your abused and ruined wife! Look at me before you go into eternity. It may add another sting to your already afflicted conscience."

"Mercy!" gasped the dying man, falling back upon his pillow, overcome with excitement; "this is my wife."

"Yes; own to these men that I am your wife, and tell me where is my daughter? Speak, and tell me, before it is too late—and your miserable soul may find relief."

"I have told all—confessed all," said he in a whisper. "There," said he, pointing to the paper which the magistrate still held in his hand. The woman grasped it, and running her eyes hastily over it, her countenance became lighted by an almost unearthly brilliency.

"Yes," said she, "your conscience has goaded you to make the confession. May God forgive you, as I do," and she moved as if to leave the room.

"Stay," said he; "wait one moment. Here, take my hand," said he, extending his thin, bony hand, "and say that you forgive me!" She took it, and turning her eyes towards heaven, repeated in a deep solemn voice her forgiveness.

"Now I can die," said the invalid; and with a convulsive spasm, he clapped his hands, a faint smile lit up his countenance for a moment—and he was dead.

All present were terribly excited. The tale of crime that had been told them—the sudden appearance of the wronged and ruined wife—all kindled emotions in the breasts of the physician and magistrate that my pen cannot describe. Let us draw a vail over the scene, and betake ourselves to the drama being enacted by the previous personages of our eventful tale.

ROMANTIC STORY.—A French paper relates the following tale:—Two days ago a young milkwomon of the environs of La Baumette, newly married, was carrying the produce of her dairy to the market of Angers, when she found on her way a black cow fastened to a tree, and at a safe distance, under another tree lay a large bundle. Her curiosity was first attracted to the latter, which she found to contain a beautiful baby girl, wrapped in fine linen and warm flannels. On further examination she discovered a purse containing 27 golden Napoleons and an annonymous letter, intimating that the mother of the child was driven by powerful considerations to part with it for several years: that the 500f. were for the person who would humanely supply her place, and the black cow was to afford the child milk; adding that every year the fostermother should receive an ample sum for the maintenance and education of the child, until circumstances permitted its natural parent to resume the charge. The young milkwoman accepted the trust thus reposed in her, and instead of proceeding to the market, hastened home with with the young foundling, the cow, the purse, and the letter.

YOUNG MEN ON IMPERIAL THRONES.—Some of the most important empires on the Globe are now ruled by young men. The Emperor of China, Hien Eung, is now in the twenty-second year of his age, and the third of his reign. It will be recollected that he is of the Tartar or Tu-tsing dynasty. Prince Chu-kisin, of the Ming dynasty, who aspires to the throne of China, is about nineteen years of age. The Sultan, or Shah of Persia, Nasser-Din, is about twenty years of age. Abdul Mejid-Khan, the Sultan of Turkey, was born in April 1823—of course he is now little over thirty years of age. The Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, is nearly twenty three, having been born in August 1830. He ascended the imperial throne in December 1848. These empires embrace more than one-third of the population of the world.

BLEEDING.—Among the strong cases brought forward by the anti-phlebotomists, is that of the celebrated Madame Malibran, the inimitable queen of song. She was playing on the stage when last seen in public—entering with all her soul into the character, and giving intense interest to the piece before an immense audience. At the point in which all her powers were taxed to the utmost stretch of a naturally delicate organization, she fainted, from extreme physical exhaustion. A physician, seated in front, leaped instantly to her assistance; and instead of administering a cordial, he bled the already debilitated woman. She never rallied.

Lord Byron, in his last sickness, said to the medical attendants, "Do with me what you like, but bleed me you shall not." After much reasoning and repeated entreaties, says the narrative, Mr. Milleugen at length succeeded in obtaining from him a promise, that should he feel his fever increase at night, he would allow Dr. Bruno to bleed him. They drew about twenty ounces On the following morning, April 17th, the bleeding was twice repeated. On the 19th the poet died.

John Hunter proved, continue the opponents of blood-letting, that the blood lives; every drop, therefore, that is extracted by artificial or other means, is actually a drop of life irrecoverably lost. The Jews cautiously avoided the loss of this precious fluid; and hence another argument has been drawn against the practice of bleeding.

THE FIRST MEETING BETWEEN SCOTT AND THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.—One day, while Scott was still at Edinburgh, there came into the city a brawney, tough fellow, driving a flock of sheep. It was James Hogg, who finding himself in the capital, was seized with a violent desire to see himself in print, and accordingly got somebody to strike off some copies of a few of his verses, which, however, made no sensation.

"The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border" set him to work at imitating the old Scottish ballads; and as his efforts were warmly praised by Scott, he came down again from the forest to pay his friend a visit. He, with William Laidlaw and others, was invited to dinner. The worthy shepherd appeared in his ordinary herdsman's dress, with his hands well tarred with a recent smearing. Not being accustomed to the society of "grand folks," he had communed with himself as to how he should act, and had come to the conclusion that he ought to copy the lady of the house in all things. Mrs. Scott, being unwell, received her guests reclining on a sofa, and Jamie according'ly, true to his precedent, had no sooner made his bow than he threw himself upon the sofa, and stretched himself out in earnest. At dinner he ate, drank, and sang, and chattered, stunning the guests by his loud voice, anecdotes, jokes and remarks, and when some of the party came to depart, he gave them a hearty shake of the hand, and begged they would favor him with a call. Scott, after this, could not help laughing at the freaks of his guest, and Mr. Skene of Rubislaw, who was present, says that he never saw Scott laugh more heartily than he did at the recollection of the shepherd's visit. Scott ever afterwards called Hogg "Shakspeare."
