Poetry.

THE FLIGHT OF THE HOURS

BY C. F. CHANDLER.

The liquid days viewless angels,
And still go gliding by,
And bear each moment's record up
To Him who sits on high.

The poison of the nectar
The heart's deep flower carps yield,
And aniple still the gather swift,
And leave us in the field.

And some fly by on pinions
Of gorgeous gold and blue,
And some fly on with drooping wing
Of sorrow's darker hue.

And as we spend each minute
That God for us has given,
The deeds are known before his throne—
The tale is told in Heaven.

And we who talk among them,
As one by one departs,
Think not that they are hovering
Forever round our hearts.

Live summer days that hover
Around the idle flowers,
They gather every act and thought,
Those viewless angel hours.

And still they steal the record,
And bear it far away;
This mission night by day or night,
No magic power can stay.

So teach me, heavenly Father,
To spend each flying hour,
That as they go they may not show
My heart a poison flower.

VARIETY.

ASHES AS MANURE.

What a mass of information might be obtained on all the details of agricultural practice, would each one who has experimented—in the use of different fertilizers, for instance—communicate that experience to the public.

Ashes we believe to be of material benefit to all dry soils, and to all crops grown upon them.—Some years since, we applied a dressing of about twenty-five bushels per acre, to a portion of gravelly loam soil, in grass at the time, to the manifest improvement of that crop. Afterward, it was ploughed up and planted to corn and potatoes, and there was a marked difference in the growth and product compared with portions of the field unashed. The potato vines were much more thrifty—far less injured by the drouth, and the crop fair and good—more than double that on like soil to which no ashes were applied. The corn, also, was excellent.

The effect of the application of ashes in quantity is felt for several years. I saw very little diminution in the difference above noticed, the last year, though the whole field was manured freely and planted to different garden crops. Any one can see the long continued effects of ashes, in the fertility following the burning of log heaps in the field.

As a top dressing for corn, about two table spoonfuls to a hill, applied as soon as the corn is fairly above ground, has been found of great benefit.—We would not forego their use, even if we could get twenty-five cents a bushel for all the ashes we made. We have noticed, again and again, a plain difference in the yield of corn fields dressed and undressed; and believe that ashes hasten the maturity as well as increase the product of the crop enough to pay double that amount in return for the application.

In the garden, we always use ashes freely; and our garden will compare favorably with other farmer's gardens. For all kinds of roots and vines, they are excellent fertilizers, and assist in preventing the depredations of various bugs and worms, so plentiful in summer, and so often injuring materially the various vegetables.

Other manures should be used, and used freely; but ashes will assist in bringing their virtues into the state most available to the crop, as well as having a beneficial effect upon the soil. We have often noticed mellow spots where ashes had been freely applied, both in the case of log heaps before noticed and in instances where they were spread upon the surface of dry, light land.—Genesee Farmer.

THE DEAD.—How beautiful is the memory of the dead. What a holy thing it is in the human heart, and what a chastening influence it sheds upon human life. How it subdues all the harshness that grows up within us in the daily intercourse with the world. How it melts our unkindness, and softens our pride, and kindling our deepest love and waking our highest aspirations. Is there one who has not loved some friend gone into the eternal world, with whom he delights to live again in memory? Does he not love to sit down in the hushed and tranquil hours of existence, and call around him the face, the form, so familiar and cherished,—to look into the eye that mirrored not more clearly his own face than the soul which he loves,—to listen to the tones which were once melody in his ear and have echoed softly in his heart since they were hushed to his senses? Is there a spirit to which heaven is brought nearer by holding some kindred soul. How friend follows friend into the happy dwelling place of the dead, until we find at length that they who loves us on the heavenly shore are more than they that dwell among us. Every year witnesses the departure of some one whom we knew and loved; and when we recall the names of all those that have been dear to us in life how many we see passed into that city which is imperishable.

The blessed dead! how free from stain is our love for them. The earthly taint of our affections is buried with that which was corruptable, and the divine flame in its purity illumines our breasts.—We have no fear of losing them. They are dead for us eternally in the mansions prepared for our reunion. We shall find them waiting for us, in their garments of beauty. The glorious dead! how reverently we speak their names. Our hearts are sanctified by their words which we remember. How wise they have now grown in the limitless fields of truth. How joyous they have become by the undying fountains of pleasure. The immortal dead! how unchangeable is their love for us.—How tenderly they look down upon us, and how closely they surround our being. How earnestly they entreat us, and how touchingly they rebuke the evil of our lives.

Let us talk pleasantly of the dead, as those who no longer suffer and are tried,—as those who pursue no longer the fleeting, but have grasped and secured the real. With them the fear and the sorrowing, the hope and the terror, and the pain are all passed; the fruition of life has begun.

CHILBLAINS.—Our contemporary of the Granite Farmer counts our receipt for the cure of chilblains, by washing them in the water in which potatoes have been boiled, applied as high a temperature as the patient can bear, and taken occasion to recommend another method of cure as likely to be perfectly reliable as follows:—2 oz. mutton tallow; 1 oz. best olive oil; 1-2 oz. pure white wax; 1-2 oz. gum camphor, pulverized; 1-4 oz. spirits turpentine.

Melt melt the wax, then add the tallow, and when the melts add the oil; now put in the camphor, remove from the fire, and stir in the spirits turpentine. The liquid should be poured into a wide mouth jar or flask you intend to keep it in; for thick, the salve is invaluable.

An Irishman being asked on a late trial for a settlement of his marriage, based his case upon the statement that he had married a widow with a large fortune, which included in the dowry a large family, beside cash and a few chattels. The counsel then inquired:
