They Are Now Leaving the North for the Warm South.

The United States Government Watches Their movements—Some Interesting:

Facts Concerning Their Flight.

This is the season of the year when hundreds of brought of the sunny south. These migrate, by night and by day, in large battalions from the frost bound north down to the sunny south. These migrations form one of the most interesting studies of ornithologists, who tells us that the little voyagers make their long journey with the precision and discipline of an army on the march They have their advance and rear guards, while the main body is kept compact. Of course there are streams.

The stars as a guide.

The massing of these forces in the same on stars to be seen, and there is no light anywhere in the sky, the birds become bewildered and iffy toward any light they see. One lighthouse keeper, on Long Island, in his report, just hand ed to the department, says: "On one dark night I think in must have seen, from about 11 o'clock to dawn, more than 100,000 birds pass my tower. There must have been quite that number, judging from the size of the flocks which swept by on the wind like great dark clouds. The stragglers from the light and many dashed themselves to pieces."

The massing of these forces in the early fall is very curious and highly interesting. Not a single bird starts southward until the cutting northern winds begin to pipe. Then all the families or broods for miles around begin to collect until. hundreds and sometimes thousands get together and form into a body on the edge of a wood. Here the younger birds wheel, and scream and frolic, chasing each other through air; but the edges of a wood.
