Lecture on Chemistry.

Dr. Howit's fifth lecture on chemistry was delivered in the Town Hall last night (Monday) in presence of a large audience—who seemed to take much in delivered audience—who seemed to take much interest in the information elicited from the remarks of the lecturer, who, after YEARS—1859, 166; 1860, 120; 1861, 183; briefly reviewing what was demonstrated odies expand by receiving heat, and 181; 1866, 221; 1867, 169; 1868, 201. in the previous discourse, viz : that all contract when it is extracted, etc., Burns' Anniversary at Rock to this general law, and that if this ele-ment obeyed the same laws as other met in the house of a respected and worthe tendency of heat to an equilibrium. Heat attains an equilibrium by travelling in three different ways, namely, by conduction, by radiation, and by reflection. A despatch from Ottawa says:—The negotiations between Mr. Howe and the Government are still going on. There is it in travelling of heat along getiations between Mr. Howe and the Government are still going on. There is little doubt an arrangement will be come the better conductor it was, while porous materials were poor conductors. Metals are the best conductors, by Indian to be any ground at present for the report that Mr. Howe will take office under his covered the earth before the the tendency of heat to an equilibrium. inaugurated so auspiciously, the paticles of matter till it pervades the whole. The chance the substance the better conductor it was, while porous materials were poor coint of the most an exception. Glass also was an indifferent conductor, and so was snow, for when this covered the earth before the ground was forcen, it would be found in spring that the frost had not penctrated through the snow. Were it not for this preservative quality in snow, many grains could not be grown. We prefer woolen clothing in winter to cotton, but in reality the former was not warmer than the latter, but did not remove that the transpose of the carbon that the latter, but did not remove the latter, but did not remove that the latter, but did not remove the latter, but did not not latter, but did not latter, but did not latter, but did not not latter, but did not sky, the thermometer rose, the surface of the earth is heated, and little dew was formed. Dew, then, was caused by the air coming in contact with some substance colder than itself. During a cloudy night the rays of heat from the earth don't pass on to the regions of space, but are reflected and absorbed. On a bright night the air cools more rapidly, and the air charged with moisture is condensed. The next lecture will take place on Tuesday evening, when we hope to see a still larger attendance.
