A duty and discipline movement has been started in England A book of essays on the above subject has been written by eminent. people and the appendix of the book composes thirty pages of approvals and expressions of opinion of some of the most prominent English thinkers of the day and everybody agrees the movement is a splendid one and everybody approves of the campaign against indiscipline. Far be that I should be so presumptous as to have an opinion that should disagree with these profound thinkers, yet, when the Earl of Meath "ventures to suggest" that one of the faults of modern education is that, "Neither the boys nor girls are taught that the call of duty must be cheerfully obeyed whether or not its due performance entails hardship or suffering. He continues: "In our desire to give the children a good time we are weakening their moral fibre and producing a generation of men and women which is in a large measure content to shirk hard work and to pass through life without ever making the fullest use of the powers with which they have been endowed.' How many people do we know in the west who do not cheerfully answer the "call of duty"? Perhaps in our humbler stations

Why is it that crowds go to consult of life we have a greater knowledge of the little, monotonous grindthe specialist from Paris whenever in ing, menial duties that require persistent continuous efforts to obey these last few years he has visited this "call of duty". Yet the ever-repeated calls are met with the cheerful optimism of the west. Is not teaching by "example" the most effective method? The earl goes on: "There are few of us who are enamored of that the appliances of Mr. Claverle for hard work; we prefer ease and comfort to the strenuous life, howrupture (and also for all abdominal ever much we may recognize in theory its advantages to the human race. Now I know numbers of people who work at their particular work because of the pleasure they get out of it.

Every human being is fitted for some particular work—call it a hobby if you will and all the money, ambition or le e does not equal the actual interest of the work involved in that "hobby". Per haps if one of the aims of education were to find out just what walk of life for which each child is particularly fitted and train that child -your very life-do not heshate to accordingly, then the efforts to avoid work, and the half-performance

The greatest results of any profession or labor is gained if we can first create the desire for it. That is what we are trying to do in our public schools. A great many condemn this method contending that in our wish to acquire this we make things easy and that we are endeavoring to withdraw most stimuli to exertion, particularly in the case of children. Hence they advocate the more strenuous methods and a stricter discipline in the training of children of the E. B. present generation.
