A FATEFUL... DIAMOND

"I wish I was a man this minute, and I'd earn something to help you, Aunt Mary," he said, looking up at her with a flushed face and sad, yet

You've always been a good boy, Louis, and I wish I could have done better by you, for your mother was a little lady, if there ever was one," she replied, earnestly. "Do you suppose I've got any relations anywhere?" the lad questioned, after another thoughtful silence.

"Goodness only knows, child. All I know about you is that your poor mother came here when you were three or four months old. She was a pretty little thing, but sickly-looking. She hired one room of me, and always paid the rent promptly, but where she got the money, or how she ever lived, is more than I can tell. She had a dreadful cough, and grew weaker and weaker every day, though I used to take her up a bite to tempt her appetite now and then when we had something nice, which we often did in those days. But three months from the day she came here I went in to see her in the morning, and found her dead in her bed, and you sleeping as sound as a top beside her. She had burst a blood vessel in the night while coughing, and died all by herself, with no one to do her a kind turn. The child never moved as he listened to this sad story, but great tears gathered in his dark eyes and rolled down his flushed cheeks.

He had heard something of this story before, though not quite so many of the details.

"She had a little money in an old wallet," Mary Jones resumed, "besides a gold chain and a beautiful ring with a great pearl in it. I had to sell those, though, to get money enough to bury her. She hadn't any clothes to speak of, and was about as poor as anyone could well be. I thought I should find something to tell me who she was, but there wasn't a letter or a scrap of anything to show that she had a friend in the world. There was only her wedding-ring, and a little book of poetry, with her name, 'Annie,' and a verse underneath, written in a nice, gentlemanly hand, and signed 'A.,' to tell that she ever belonged to any-body. I hadn't the heart to sell that for I thought you'd value it if you lived to grow up."

"Have you the book of poetry now, Aunt Mary?" Louis asked, wiping the tears from his face with the sleeve of his jacket.

"Yes, I put it away with the ring."
"May I look at it?"

The boy's voice trembled and his lips quivered as he made his request. The woman set down her iron, and going to a bureau that stood in a corner of the room, unlocked a drawer and took from it a small box.

This she brought and handed to the child

He reverently opened the box. A small volume of Tennyson's poems, bound in blue and gold, lay within it, together with another very small box.

He took out the book and opened it at the filly-leaf, and read there, penned in clear, beautiful characters:

"Whatever lot be mine, Long and happy days be thine, Ere thy full and noncrease."
Dates of time its latest page."

That simple initial, with the penpicture of a dove underneath, was all the signature there was to that fond

Young and unlearned as he was, hardly able to read the writing, he could not understand the full meaning of those tender lines; but he instinctively felt as if a loving hand had penned them, and that "A.," whoever ne or she might have been, must have loved his mother well. In the back of the book there were a few quoted lines, written in a delicate hand and signed "Annie," and his young heart thrilled as he recognized the fact that if he possessed nothing else, he at least had a bit of his mother's handwriting.

He slowly turned those gilt-edged leaves, and his little face grew solemn and tender as he thought of those white hands, which once had turned the same pages, now lying folded and cold in death.

He closed the book after awhile, and laid it tenderly back in the box, and then opened that other smaller one. It contained his mother's weddingring-a small, heavy hoop of gold, with simply the date of her marriage engraven on its inner surface. This, also, after a little while, he reverently replaced in the box.

"Do you suppose 'A.' was my father?"

he asked at last, a perplexed, almost distressed look in his dark eyes. "Bless you, I don't know anything more than you do," returned Mrs. Jones, who had been closely observing him. "Your mother never told me anything about herself. I suppose she hadn't any idea that she was going to die so soon, poor thing. If she had she might have said something about you, and left some word telling what she wanted done with you. As I told you before, she was a pretty little thing, while you were as fine a baby boy as ever the sun shone on, and it is a pity, if your father was living, that he couldn't have had you. My own children hadn't come then, or I suppose I should have thought I had enough to care for, but I hadn't the heart to send you to the asylum, and  John got better wages then. I had a carpet on the floor then, and pretty curtains at the windows, and we were very comfortable. I've kept on growing fonder of you all the time, and you've been a help to me in taking care of the children. I'm only sorry I couldn't have done better for you,"

she concluded, sorrowfully.
"You've been very good to me, Aunt Mary, and I'll pay you for it some time. I won't be a poor boy always—I'll make something yet. If there are chances in the world for others, I guess there is one for me somewhere -I'll find it, and then I'll make the most of it," said Louis Dunbar, with a resolution not common in one so young. "It's rather hard," he went on, musingly, "not to really know who you are, nor who your father was. Perhaps I have relations somewhere who would be glad to help me if they knew about me. But I'll see what I can do for myself, and I bet I will have a pile of money some time, and then I shan't let you work as hard as you do now, Aunt Mary."

Mrs. Jones laughed good-naturedly over these bright visions of youth-frail air castles that soon would crumble and fall. "I hope you won't be disappointed," she said; adding, with the old bitterness in her voice: "But whatever you do don't you ever ask a girl to marry you until you are sure you can take care of her. Better stay single all your life than make a drudge of your wife, and let your children come up anyhow.

"I won't," was the eager reply. I ever want a wife I'll get a house first to put her in-a nice one, too-and money ahead to help take care of her. May I keep these now?" he asked, after a moment, holding up the box she had given him. "I'd like too, and look at them by myself once in a while."

"If I thought you wouldn't lose them," Mrs. Jones began, reflectively.
"I won't," Louis interrupted. "I have a box that locks, you know. I'll put them in, and be just as careful as I can be of them."

'Yes, you may have them," said Mary Jones. And, bidding her good-night, the boy away to his little loft above the hot kitchen, where, after storing his treasures safely away in the little "box that locked," he threw himself upon his bed and was soon fast asleep and dreaming that a graceful figure, with a sweet, fair face, came and bent fondly over him, and that, reaching up his arms, he placed them about her neck and called her "mother."

CHAPTER III. Early the next morning-long before the sun had risen-Louis Dunbar was Very quietly he stole out of bed, his face very gave and thoughtful and resolute, and, hastily dressing himself, slipped noiselessly down to the kitchen, where, after procuring himself a piece of bread and meat from a closet, he softly let himself out of the house. He turned his steps toward the outskirts of the city, and walking on and on, was five miles from the busy town when the clocks upon its many steeples struck the hour of six.

Louis seemed to have some definite plan in view, for he kept straight upon the highway until he came to a large farmhouse-a thrifty-looking place white-coated, green-blinded, with great, beautiful elms drooping gracefully all about the smoothly-shaven

"He hires boys to pick strawberries, xes: lots of them."

"Would he give me a job?"
"I don't know; you can ask him," the girl replied, in a kind tone.
"Mr. Brown," she called into the kitchen, "here's a boy to see you; he wants a job." Then she went back to her work, leaving Louis standing alone upon the broad stone steps outside.

The farmer soon made his appearance, however, and, doffing his tattered straw hat, Louis asked him if he would hire him to pick berries.

"Who are you?" the man asked bluntly, and studying him attentively with his keen eyes.

"My name's Louis Dunbar." (To be Continued.)
