THE EARTH.

Creation's smiles of golden hue, Borne on the west wind's sigh. O'er mountain's brow and lowly dell-Would fain their transient moments tell, And whisper-They, like I and you, Must one day fade and die!

Yes, when God sends abroad his word, To bid time's progress stay; Laid low shall be the lofty pine, And flowers their beauty all resign, Just as the song of summer's bird With autumn glides away.

Yet O, how fair do all things seem ! Too bright to sink in death : The sun-ray crowns the forest trees, And revels with the passing breeze The valley's brook laughs in the beam, And loves the violets breath ! Now mellow corn fields waving stand,

Inhaling noon-day's heat;
The Lord show's down the fruitful store, Nor need his children ask for more: Ten thousand blessings from his hand Are mingled at their feet. But who is he that dreads the morn,

When earth's great bond shall rend ? Soon all her joys will cease to charm; Since none but heaven's own mighty arm Can man uphold with hope's new-born, And streams of comfort send Hopes-of a brighter, better world, Beyond the spreading skies! There, faithful ones in light now roam; And to that long-sought, sinless home, ul, with banner all unfurl'd. Takes wing-and never dies!
