lake Bangweolo. A Katanga company had as my brother and his wife were exceedingly tired of me and very glad to rid themselves of my care, I was presented with a valedictory and informed that for the future I might make my home wherever I chose, provided I came not near them. I was also to occupy myself at anything of my choice, and I might go as far away as I thought best. I might become a gentleman or tramp. They were not responsible for any of my actions. In short, I was free forever more. As for necessary expenses they would be met handsomely. A certain sum per year was to be allowed me as my share in my father's property. This I could obtain by addressing the village magistrate who had charge of such finances. Probably I would not have got the money, only it was so stipulated in father's will, and avoid it my brother could not, however much he might want to. It was a very goodly sum, enough to support me for life or start me well in some business, as the state was a large one, and my share one-third. How could I come in possession of any amount while yet a minor, you ask: Well, I don't know how they managed it: I only know I got it and that fully satisfied me.

To all these terms of the "Treaty of Grumps" I heartily acceded, and my affairs in my native town were speedily arranged preparatory to my departure. I hade addieu to my schoolmates and other acquaintances, bundled up my few possessions with some cash, and with "one long last look" at the old place, went out at the gate one bright morning with feelings of mingled sorrow and gladness, bound—I knew not whither.

Rev. Charles A Berry has come back, says the London News, from a trip around the world, via Quebec, Vancouver and the Australian colonies, and, as it appears in his narrative in "The Young Man," nothing has impressed him more than the fact that in a journey of 40,000 miles it was only at two points that he passed, as he expresses it, from beneath our national ensign.
