

PLATE 10.

FIG. 1. Quadrangular vessel for eating from, or for holding fat. It is of wood; the bulging sides show carving in relief, with a design of eyes, etc., on front and back. Under this is a grinning human face. Both sides are ornamented alike; and the middle of the ornament is an eagle's head.

Fig. 2. Boat-shaped vessel of wood. The margin is ornamented with inlaid teeth, and the front and back with the pattern so frequently met, of grinning heads of men and animals. The sides are ornamented with simple stripes.

Fig. 3. Quadrangular bowl of wood. Front, back, and flanks decorated with a pattern of eyes, etc., but on the front and back two human faces are added; while on the sides are two faces, apparently of animals, in profile.

Fig. 4. Large quadrangular bowl of wood. The margin is decorated with teeth, and in front and back is the usual ornament, with a grinning human face. The sides have a feather of stripes at the ends.

Fig. 5. Boat-shaped bowl of wood. The front protrudes and shows an animal's head; the back, the claws of some animal. The whole vessel is richly decorated, and has a design of wings at the flanks.

Fig. 6. Small boat-shaped bowl of wood. Rather coarse workmanship. The front shows an animal's head, and the back the legs with projecting claws.

Figs. 7, 8. Boat-shaped bowl of animal design, richly carved of wood. The front is an animal's head, the back shows two feet with claws, and the fore-feet are carved on the sides of the bowl.

Fig. 9. Wooden drinking-bowl of grotesque form. This vessel is designed to represent a man lying on his back, whose open abdomen forms the hollow of the vessel, while the gaping mouth, and the hands holding cups, show plainly the use of the bowl. The deeply sunken eyes accord well with the design. The vessel is called "Skololech," and serves at great feasts, when bowls of this kind are used for drinking melted fat. It comes from Fort Rupert.
