Thomas. Unfortunately, there had been a slight "washout" beneath the rails at the entrance to the siding, which was not observed until the big locomotive was on the spot. The track gave way beneath the weight of the locomotive, which suddenly toppled over.

Mr. Thomas leaped in time to clear the engine, but was caught by a great stream of boiling water thrown from the condenser pipe, which broke when the engine careened. This stream from a four-inch pipe with 250 pounds of pressure back of it, inflicted such terrible injuries that death was a happy release 24 hours later.

The unfortunate victim was about 27 years of age a young man well esteemed by all and of a family deeply attached to one another, who keenly felt the separation under such distressing circumstances. His parents and several brothers and sisters survive. A short time before the accident, he had told his friends that he was about through with railroading, as the life held too many dangers.

The funeral was one of the most largely attended held here for some time.

This stream from a four-inch pipe with 250 pounds of pressure back of it, inflicted such terrible injuries that death was a happy release 24 hours later.
