SHIRE AND CLYDESDALE

Breeds That Resemble, But Yet Have Distinction Between Them, It need hardly be said that the two less closely in general appearance and that they plainly show the to that they are related to one a that they are related to one another. Shire horses are, as a rule, weighter and possess more substance than Clydesdales, and the former are on an average somewhat bigger ardmals than the latter. It would of course, be wrong to think that this is invariably the case; this is not a because a heavy Clydesdale hors; may be weightier and altogether bigger than a light and small Shire; but comparing the breeds in a general way, the above holds good. Clydesdales have more sloping shoulders. f the shoulder and of the p ole, less abundant in the ale than is the case in the d light, and shows good ride. This is due largely
