SENATORIAL CONTEST IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 31.—The annual session of the Massachusetts legislature, at which a United States senator will be chosen and during which action will be taken on many matters of State importance, will be convened at noon tomorrow. The contest for the seat of Senator W. Murray Crane is attracting much attention. There are half a dozen aspirants for the toga, representing a wide range of political views. The Republican majority on joint ballot is about 40 and presumably only a Republican will be chosen. Samuel W. McCall, representative in Congress, and Curtis Guild, Jr., former governor of Massachusetts and at present the United States ambassador at St. Petersburg, are generally regarded as the strongest possibilities for the senatorship. Other active candidates in the field are Congressman John W. Weeks and William B. Plunkett, the latter representing himself as the choice of the western part of the State.

WOMAN-COP SEES NIGHT COURT. Los Angeles Policewoman Wears Uniform And a Big Badge.

New York, Dec. 30.—Mrs. Alice Stebbins Wells, the woman member of the Los Angeles police force, who is studying the police courts in the important cities, visited the men's night court last night, accompanied by Capt. John A. Fish of the New York Yacht Club.

Mrs. Wells wore a fawn colored uniform dress with a brown stripe and a police badge four times as large as the New York one. When she was introduced to Magistrate House he invited her to sit beside him on the bench. Mrs. Wells said that she was sent around to pick up points that might be beneficial to Los Angeles. She said that out there they are particularly interested in our night courts.

Mrs. Wells was asked if she had been voted into office and replied that she was on the police force before equal suffrage was granted.

TRULY AMERICAN ARCHITECTURE

FRENCH EXPERT PRAISES OUR PROGRESS IN BUILDING IN LAST FOUR YEARS.

New York, Dec. 31.—Within a decade America should have a school of architecture distinctly its own and as good as any the world has ever known, according to Achille Duchene, a famous French architect and landscape gardener who is returning to his home at 10 Quai Debilly, Paris, for the second time in four years after having executed commissions in this country for rich Americans.

The last trip took him by easy stages across country to San Francisco and permitted him to study architecture intimately from every angle. He leaves this morning on the steamship Provence.

"The progress which has marked American architecture since my visit four years ago is distinct and admirable," he said. "It is an architecture born of necessity and based upon a knowledge of every architecture the world has known."

"There is little of the Renaissance and the Gothic now in evidence, and the devotion to the severer Roman and Greek types for the last decade has developed the appreciation of dimension, scale, and harmony. In these qualities New York is good and undoubtedly leads the country."

"I notice in the newer buildings of New York little of decadence in architecture. The ceilings are for the greater part undecorated and the cornice has been dispensed with. It is better, you know, to have no decorations at all than to have poor decorations."

"The lines are invariably good. There is, too, an inventive originality about the exterior architecture which is entirely harmonious and quite fitting. I am not one who insists, because there are columns in the basement, a building shall rise column upon column to its completion."

"Your public library is always classic and severe," he said in answer to a question. "But it is good and correct. I like the interior of many of the rooms. Their severity attracts one to the lines of their construction, which are a delight. Yes, it is a good building."

"America has an advantage peculiarly its own in architecture. It assimilates quickly, the most quickly of any country—England is the slowest. And through America's quick progress in art, its eventual selection of that which is best, and its wonderful application to its peculiar needs, it must of necessity develop an architecture of its own."

"Your last greatest buildings, the new University building, and the new Municipal Building, are all most wonderfully interesting and commendable."

"The foreigner entering the port of New York experiences a sensation more wonderful, more peculiar, more impressive to an inexpressible degree than he gains entering any other port in the world. Naples, Salonic, the Golden Gate of your California, are truly wonderful. There are many ports where the mountains, the valleys, the sky and the sea all appeal with their beauty. But it is the beauty created by God."

"Coming into New York—ah, then is New York indeed beautiful. It is so vast, so Herculean. Whatever of line is in error is lost. One is aware only of its vastness and its grandeur. And this is a grandeur built by man. I cannot hope to describe the sensation when one approaches New York from the sea for the first time."

"What must be the impression of the immigrant as he lands in New York. How must he feel as he stands gazing down one of your vast avenues teeming with the life of a nation greater than he has ever known."

"He does not know such streets where he came from. And as he gazes aloft at the lighted windows of your vast buildings wherein men are working like bees in a hive, each window representing a unit of energy which might occupy a whole building in his native land, then must he wonder if he can ever become a part of this, a success in its midst. London in no manner presents this aspect. Its buildings are not so vast, its streets turn."

"And there is one peculiar phase of your American life which has confused me. It is that your cottage dwellers do not build fences about their property. Lawns slope down to the streets and are not walled off. The land adjoins the land of another without apparent restriction."

"This condition in a country where the individual is developed to the utmost and socialism is not an accepted doctrine is confusing in that it indicates a community spirit, a consideration for the ensemble which is lacking in other countries. It is contradictory, isn't it?"
