A GLIMPSE OF THE DARK VALLEY.

LONDON

School of Elocution and Expression.

Every one noticed at the Hall that Lady edmond was sadly altered in those days— very one but one, and that was her husband.

Had Sir Hugh's indifference made him blind? for he completely ignored the idea of any change in her. She was pale and thin—very thin, they told him. Hugh said he supposed it was only natural; and when they spoke of her broken rest and failing appetite, he said that was natural, too.

They must take better care of her, and not let her do so much. That was his sole remark; and then, when she came into the room a few minutes afterward to bathe his aching head and read him to aleep, or to sit fanning the teasing flee from him for the faming the teasing files from him for the hour together, Hugh never seeme to notice the languid step or the pale, tired face, out of which the lovely color had facted.

His Wee Wifie was such a dear, quiet, nurse, he said, and with that scant and of praise Fay was supposed to be setisfied.

But she knew now that all his gentle looks and words were given her out of sheer pity, or in colder kindness, and shrunk from his caresses as much as she had once sought them; and often, as she spoke to him, the shamed, conscious color rose suddenly to her fair face, and broken breaths so impeded her utterance that her only safety was in silence. Scarcely more than a child in years, yet Fay bore her martyrdom nebly. Unloved, unhelped, she girded on her heavy cross and carried it from day to day with a resignation and courage that was truly womanly; and hiding all her wrongs and her sorrows from him, only strove with her meek, young ways to win him yet.

Ent as time went on her love and her suffering increased, and the distance widened miserably between them.

Sometimes when her trouble was very heavy upon her—when Hugh had been more than usually restless, and had spoken irritably and sharply to her—she would break down utterly and nestle her face against his in a moment's forgetfulness, and cry softly.

Then Hugh would wonder at her, and But she knew now that all his gentle against his in a moment's forgetruiness, and cry softly.

Then Hugh would wonder at her, and stroke her hair, and tell her that she had grown nervous by staying at home so much; and then he would lecture her a little in a grand, marital way about taking more care of herself, until she dried her eyes and asked him to forgive her for being so foolish; and so the pent-up pain that was within her found no outlet at all.

"Oh, if he will not love me—if he will not love me—if he will not love me—if he will not ory to love me, I must die," cried the poor child to herself; and then she would oreep away, with a cert-broken look on her face, and sob herself to sleep.

and then she would greep away, with a geart-broken look on her face, and sob herself to sleep.

Ah, that was a bitter time to Fay; but she bore it patiently, not knowing that the days that were to follow should be still more full of bitterness than this.

Sir Hugh was getting better now—from the hour he had seen Margaret there had been no relapse; but he was struggling through his convalescence with a restless impatience that was very trying to all who came in contact with him.

He was longing for more freedom and change of air. He should never grow trong until he went away, he told Fay; and then she understood that he meant to eave her. But the knowledge gave her no fresh pain. She had suffered so much that even he could not hurt her more, she thought. She only said to him once in her shy way, "You will be at home in time, Hugh; you will not leave me to go through it all alone?" And he had promised faithfully that he would come back in plenty of time.

And the next morning she found him impatience that was very trying to all who impatience that was very trying to all who came in contact with him.

He was longing for more freedom and thange of air. He should never grow trong until he went away, he told Fay; and then she understood that he meant to and then she understood that he meant to cave her. But the knowledge gave her no fresh pain. She had suffered so much that even he could not hurt her more, she thought. She only said to him ence in her shy way, "You will be at home in time shy way, "You will be at home in time shy way, "You will be at home in time shy way, "You will be at home in time shy way, "You will not leave me to go through it all alone?" And he had promised faithfully that he would come back in plenty of time.

And the next morning she found him dressed earlier than usual and standing by the window in the library, and exclaimed at the improvement; and Hugh, moving still languidly, bade her see how well the could walk. "I have been three time world, it is generally the best people who are injured in this way.

There is no harm in being respected in this world, as I have found out, and if you don't brag a little for yourself, depend on it there is no person of your acquaintance who will tell the world of your hands.

And a week after that, as they were standing toge her on the terrace, looking toward the lake and the water-lilies, Hugh, leading to the coping, with a brighter look leaning on the coping, with a brighter look leaning on the coping, with a brighter look leaning on the caping, with a brighter look leaning on the caping was a said that a rangements for the next day's journey.

He was far from well, she told him, sadly, and she hoped Saville would take great care of him; and he must still follow Dr. Martin's prescriptions, and that was all she said that night.

But the next day, when the servants were putting the portmanteaus on the carriage; and Hugh went into the blue room to bid her good-bye, all Fay's courage for sook her, and she said, piteously, "obline in a perfect anguish of weeping. Sir Hugh's brow grew dark; he hated scenes,"

Hugh, Hugh! "And, as the sense of her loneliness rushed over her, she clung to him in a perfect anguish of weeping. Sir Hugh's brow grew dark; he hated scenes," and especially such scenes as these. In his weakness he felt unable to cope with them, or to understand them. "Hay," he raid, remonstrating with her "this is very foolish," and Fay knew by his voice how vexed he was; but she was past minding it now. In her young way she was tasting the bitterness of death. "My dear," he continued, as he unloosened and held them firmly in his, "do you know what a silly child you are?" and then he relented at his own words, she was such a child. "It told you before that I should never be well until I went away, but you evidently did not believe me. Now I cannot leave you like this, for if you cry so you will not let me go quietly, I cannot go at all." Conservatory of Music MR. WM. CAVEN BARRON, BEST HOURS. well, will you promise me to be a brave little woman and not fret after me when I am gone?' he went on more gently. 'It is only six weeks, you know, Fay, and I have promised to be back in time.' 'Yes, yes, I know you will,' she answered, 'and I will be good—indeed I will, Hugh; only tell me you are not angry with me before you go, and call me your Wee Wife as you used when you first brought me heme;' and she held up her wet face to him as though she were a child wanting to be kissed and forgiven.

'You foolish birdie,' he said, laughing, but he kissed her more fondly than be had done yet. 'There, you will take care of yourself, my own Wee Wife, will you not and write long letters to me, and tell me how you are getting on.'

"Had you not better lie down, my lady?"
Mrs. Heron said to her a little while afterward, when she found her still standing in the middle of the room; and she took hold of her gently, for she did not like the look in my lady's eyes at all; and then she laid her down on the couch, and never left her until she had fallen asleep, like a child, for very trouble.

And then she went down and spoke out

And then she went down and spoke out her mind to Janet; and the substance of her speech might be gathered from the concluding sentence:

"And I am sorry to say it, Janet, of any one to whom I am beholden for the bread I eat, and whom I have known since he was a baby; but in spite of his bonny looks and pleasant ways, Sir Hugh is terribly selfish; and I call it a sin and a shame for any man to a leave a sweet young creature like that a such a time. What can he expect if she goes on fretting herself to death in this way?"

Fay could not tell why she felt so strangely weak the next day when she woke up, and Mrs. Heron could not tell, either. She did not fret; she did not even seem unhappy; she was too tired for anything of that sort, she said to herself; but day after day she lay alone in herflittle room with closed eyes and listless hands; while Nero lay at her feet wondering why his little mistress was so lazy, and why she wasted these lovely summer mornings indoors instead of running races with him and Pierre.

No, she was not ill, she assured them, doors instead of running races with him and Pierre.

No, she was not ill, she assured them, when Mrs. Heron and the faithful Janet came to look after her, and to coax her with all kinds of dainties; she was only so tired, and would they not talk to her, for she felt as though she could never sleep enough; and would some one tell Sir Hugh so whea they wrote to him, for he would get no long letters from her now—she had tried to write, but her hand was too weak to hold the pen. But for all that she would not own she was ill; it was only the heat that made her so lozy, she said again. No, they must only tell Sir Hugh that she was very tired.
