ELSIE.

It was altogether an eventful ball that charity ball at the County Family Hotel—eventful, that is, in its results. Lord Hammond said very little indeed to the beautiful Miss Westerfield. He found that, once fairly launched in conversation, she had opinions of her own. She seemed to prefer Italy to England; she had spent most of her life there, she said; but now she was to return to the family seat in Yorkshire, with her mother said; but now she was to return to the lamily seat in Yorkshire, with her mother and her uncle, for two years. It was necessary, she said, that the estate should be looked after—landowners had enormous responsibilities.

Lord Hammond had never troubled himself about his responsibilities at all. The young lady did not say what the name of the family estate was, nor if it belonged to her uncle, nor if she were the heiress to it. Lord Hammond could not have pur a question to her for the not have put a question to her for the world. The consequences may be imag-ined; the young lady thought him a wery stupid young man indeed; handsome, good-natured, most amiable—thus do we misjudge one another—but stupid, oh, so very uninteresting and stupid, not a single word to say for himself.

And so the ball and the supper that followed it came to an end, as all pleasures must. The Charteris carriages came for the guests. Lord Hammond saw his new divinity bow and retire within the precincts of the hotel with her mother and her uncle; then he had to go and look after his mother. He was thoroughly humbled by his new love-dream; he felt upid a clown, so to speak—a foxhumbar, titled clown, unworthy of the

One of the Miss Littlewoods offered to do this. Pauline, as we have said, had contrived to make herself agreeable to all the lady visitors, and these young ladies liked her, pitied her, were not jealous of her.

So Amelia Littlewood passed the night in the hotel, the landlady supplying her with all necessaries. Early in the morn-ing a maid was to be sent from Charteris in a carriage to the hotel, bringing m ing toilettes and all other things that the ing tollettes and different ladies required. Pauline had not slept till the morning, then she dropped off into the most uneasy slumber, troubled with grotesque dreams. She did not awake till long after noon. Amelia Littlewood, strong, young, and active, had slept well. Awakened before nine, she had rung to ask if the maid and the changes of apparel had arrived, and then, finding that they had, she had arisen, dressed, and breakfasted with all dispatch. Afterwards she had with all dispatch. Afterwards she had gone into the luxurious little warm drawing-room where there was a piano, and she had played a noisy fantasia, and rattled through some loud fast galops. After that she had rung and inquired of the maid if Miss Bracegirdle were awake. Finding that she was, and was breakfasting in her room, Miss Amelia Little-wood found her way there, and was welcomed by Pauline, who sat up in bed wrapped in a rose-colored dressinggown, but its bright tint gave no color to her face; she was ghastly pale, and seemed unable to eat the dainty breakfast provided for her.

In reality Pauline was in horrible fear dispatch. Afterwards she had

In reality Pauline was in horrible fear that she had estranged Lord Hammond by her foolish flirtation with his cousin. He had been brutally uncivil; he had walked away and had left her to return to the ballroom as best she could; he had looked furious, and the other one. Owen the had left too not meaning dispersent —he had left, too, not meaning disrespect to her, but still showing that he was not in love with her. After all, it was that detestable young Elsie that he was thinking of "How shall I win him again?" thought Pauline. "How shall I pacify him? I will not lose him after playing such high will not lose him after playing such high stakes to win him."

And then there entered Ar ella Little-wood, rosy, joyous, healthy having slept well, and bathed well, and breakfasted well, and practised well on the plano— Amelia full of news. Pauline could see

"Such news!" said Miss Littlewood, turning her beaming face towards Pau-line. "Lord Hammond fell over head and ears last night with the belle of the

"Oh," said Pauline, a little scornfully,

"Indeed there was," responded Amelia Littlewood, warmly; "one of the very handsomest girls you ever saw in your life—a darkey you know. I always think the dark rele ones have such adventure. the dark pale ones have such advantage, more especially if they have fine eyes." more especially if they have fine eyes."

"Bah!" said Pauline, in a scoffing tone,
"This girl's eyes are like sapphires," said Amelia, "only they dazzle; she has

At that moment Clara Trencham, the dean's daughter, the stepdaughter of Capt. Bracegirdle, came bounding into CHAPTER XXIII. Mrs. Bracegirdle looked up alarmed; she started violently, then she threw the dress she was turning on the half dress she was turning on the bed; she drew out her handkerchief and began to weep.

"I cannot bear it any longer!" she said between her sobs. "It will kill me out-right! The sooner the better-the sooner enforced sojourn in the Boulevard St. Michel.

Elsie had often seen Mrs. Bracegirdle so distressed during the time of her enforced sojourn in the Boulevard St.

It had been while weeping in this dreary fashion that the unhapppy lady had borrowed from Elsie the hundred and odd francs that remained to her of the loan of the good countess. As it was, Mrs, Bracegirdle looked at Elsie and threw out her hands.

"Clara tells me," she sobbed, "that the rent of this department is overdue: 12 tomorrow is the latest time the landlord will give. We pay for these rooms by the month; the rents here are enormous—five hundred pounds of English money a year; it makes a thousand and twenty-five francs a month—forty-one pounds. us if he did!" said Clara Trencham bitterly; "only he won't. I'm sure he won't, he is such a pitiful, miserable coward! I only wish we could get out of the house before he comes back, and take with us everything that belongs to us, and then leave him to face his creditors or blow his brains out, just as he likes; only we want money—we can't stir without money; we want twenty pounds at least. "Your plan, my child," said Mrs. Bracegifule clasping her hands, "is one which would lead us to the pit of destruction."

Ye Chase was most anxious about Pauline, who had fainted, and was it, and who was to remain at the el until the next day.

It would be a lower to see the most of the alleged murder by poisoning of Mrs. K. J. Adams. His father, Gen. Molineux, has kept up a stubborn fight to save his son.

Ottawa, Oct. 15.-Hon. David Mills heard today Mr. Geoffrion, of Montreal, argue in favor of Plaine, the Montreal murderer, getting a month's respite so as to get further evidence to establish that Plaine was insane when he committed the murder The he committed the murder. The min-ister will consider the case. Plaine is sentenced to be hanged on Oct. 25. SENSATIONAL SUIT AT SARNIA.

Sarnia, Ont., Oct. 16.—The chancellor esumed the sitting of assize here. The trial of Middleton vs. Wilkinson was commenced. It is for breach of promise of marriage, and involves sensa-tional charges of betrayal and professional misconduct. The parties are in social rank much above those who usually appear in such cases, the plaint-iff being a lady of refinement and education, and the defendant a wealthy physician.

KILLED THE WRONG MAN. Victoria, B. C., Oct. 16-Following are the details of the crime for which Henry Gill may be sentenced to die: The tragedy occurred at Work Point Barracks on Sunday, and as a result Gunner Glinnick lies dead, and Henry Gill, Sapper Royal Engineers, aged 20, has been found guilty of murder. The murder is a peculiar one, for Gill in tended to kill a man other than the man he shot. He secured a carbine and went to the canteen, where the gunners were playing cards, intending to shoot Gunner Mahoney, and on entering the canteen took aim at the back of Ma-

Gunner Foster, who was watching the men playing cards, saw him and shouted to Mahoney: "Look out!" Mahoney turned his head just as the carbine was discharged, and the bullet whizzed past his ear and struck Glinnick, who sat opposite, in the mouth. Glinnick slid to the floor bleeding in the mouth, and the others jumped upon Gill, who was borne to the

The case of Campbell vs. Weidman was called. The plaintiff, Alex. Campbell, is suing the Weidman Company, of Southwold Station, for injuries received while engaged with the company. He was running a machine at the time and a "tooth" flew out and went through Campbell's jaw. The jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff for $100 and county court costs. In the case of the King vs. John R. Tedford, the accused is charged with having on the 31st of January, 1901, disposed of a stock of groceries, purchased from James Egan, to F. R. Pennefather, for the purpose of defrauding the said James Egan. The grand jury at the spring assizes found a true bill, and the trial proceeded, but the jury did not agree. Case not finished. The action brought by Roy Hardy and Joseph Stokes against the Wabash Railroad Company for damages for in-juries received was called, the two actions being consolidated. No. 10, Stewart St., Messrs. Stott & Jury, Bowmanville, Ont.

Dear Sirs,-I accompanied the first Canadian contingent to South Africa in the capacity of bugler, and had the honor of sounding the charge at Paardeberg.
Although I had none of the severe fighting to do, still I had to march with my regiment, and I can assure you that tramping over the burning sands of the South African veldt soon uses up one's feet.

I was fortunate, however, in having with me a box of "Foot Elm" which I used freely in my shoes, and it prevented the blistering, chafing, swelling and soreness of the feet, which was so common among the boys who were no so fortunate as to have that excellent foot remedy.

I can assure you that "Foot Elm" was highly prized, not only by myself, but by every one who used it, and I have heard many members of the contingent express their high appreciation of the invaluable aid it was to them in preserving their feet on their long marches. Yours truly, D. F. Williams.
