Japan and Russia shall acknowledge the complete independence of Corea, and this demand Russia has not yet conceded. The interests of Japan in Manchuria, Baron Hayashi argues, are precisely identical with those of other powers.

It is believed at the British foreign office that the neutrality of all the other powers in the impending conflict is fully assured. France, therefore, will not support her ally, and Japan and Russia will have a clear sists that Russia shall acknowledge likely to arise. Diplomatists, however. mistake of the Manchurlan policy, of which M. Witte, the president of the council of ministers, has been made the scapegoat. It is asserted by a section of the Russian press that the reoccupation of Mukden was due to the fear that the United States would land a force there and seize the place in order to compel the fulfillment of the treaty obligations to open it to foreign commerce. This excuse does not carry weight at Pekin, where, according to the latest advices, the determination to offer the utmost resistance to Russtan encroachment, however hopeless, is stronger than ever.

The impression in Downing street is that war is liable to begin any day, inasmuch as delay will operate against Japan's chances. It is perfectly understood that Germany will render Russia all the indirect assistance possible Some friendly aid perhaps may also be supplied by France to her ally, but i is believed that French sentiment wil be, on the whole genuinely neutral.

Japan, on the other hand, relies on all the aid the neutrality laws will permit from Great Britain and the United
