"But you can not keep it alone," said the husband, helplessly. "How should I leave you alone, Rebecca, my soul?" But his "seul" answered dryly that Jehovah cared for the widows and orphans, and that her faith was strong, and she was willing to put her trust in providence.

"Besides," she added as an afterthought, "I know of a young man whe would be willing to take the place of shopman." The entrance of fresh customers put an end to the discussion for the moment; but while serving out lumpsugar or measuring yards of calico the old Jew felt as though he were in a dream. It seemed as if a large bell had got into his head and was ringing incessantly: "Alable treatise sent free. His name was Golde Safran, and he had a fresh color and flaming red curis. From the very outset he displayed an extraordinary genius for shopkeeping. He rearranged the little window in a totally new fashion, with a most effective pattern of raisins and almonds in the center, framed in by alternate bars of white and brown scop; and he bullied the peasants and flattered the town damsels with equal success.

No peasant was ever allowed to leave the shop without having purchased at least twice as much Wodki as he had originally intended to; and when the ladies did not find what they came to seek Golde Safran was sure to make them take something else in its stead. His system was was about as follows: If, for instance, a customer inquired for red pepper, he would answer briskly: "Red pepper, madam? Well, not precisely red pepper, but we have first-rate French chocolate and the finest bottled capers; "with which shall I serve you?"

thought that he should never see it again. That bunch of tall dips which he had hung up with his own hands he would never take down again; he should not see the end of that large swiss cheese. He looked down into the barrel containing salt herrings. Only a few of them remained at the bottom of the cask, for the supply always ran low at this season. The flattened fish seemed to gaze up at him with a mournful expression in their saltenerusted eyes, and to say to him: "Never again, Mendele! never again?"

But his faltering resolution was not given the chance of a loophole of escape; given the chance of a loophole of escape; not for a moment was he allowed to forget that he belonged to a better world. With pieus clearity all according to the state of the

"To Jerusalem!" exclaimed Mendele, aghast at the boldness of his wife's suggestion. "I should go to Jeeusalem?"

"Yes, to Jerusalem," said Rebecce, relieved that the decisive word which had so long been hovering on her lips had been spoken at last. "Why should you not go to Jerusalem? Scores of holy men have gene thither to end their days, and have found there consolation and peace. You will find the same."

frame of mind lasted for some twenty minutes, during which Mendele Bluhdorn walked on alone slowly but steadily. The road led slightly up hill, and, unacoustomed as he was to walking, the progress he made was but slow. When he had reached the tep of the incline, he was obliged to pause to recover breath, and, leaning on his eaken staff, Mendele turned and looked back a last time toward his native town.

Mendele Bluhdorn, therefore, saw that he could go to heaven with an easy mind, for his widow's prospects were fairly secured.

It was on a fine April afternoon that Mendele left his native town en route for Paradise, via Jerusalem. When the hour of parting drew near, his heart almost failed him, and it wanted but the shadow of an excuse to make him draw back at the eleventh hour.
