
THOUGHTS

ON THE

QUEBEC ACT.

THE cession of Canada and its dependencies, to Great Britain by the last treaty of peace, was so valuable an acquisition, that its prosperity and welfare must ever be an object of importance to this kingdom; the advantages gained by it were no less extensive to our commerce, than it was a permanent security to the tranquility of our colonies, by fixing the limits of our western dominions in that part of the globe, and thereby preventing any future dispute or controversy of right arising between the two nations; which was the original cause of the last
