PLAN TO VANQUISH THE MONARCHS OF THE SELKIRKS

Early in July, when the Canadian Alpine Club assembles at Glacier, British Columbia, for its annual outing, the members who respond to the call of the mountain peak will attempt to obtain fresh thrills and furnish new material for their journals. The knowledge that there are untold heights, whose summits are jagged and heights rival those of the Swiss Alps in every respect, will be fresh to many people who have almost come to believe that only the summits of the Himalayas, rising into the rarified air of Central Asia, as bleak as the mountains of the moon, remain to be surmounted.

Four very prominent peaks, among a multitude of lesser ones in this region, are still virgin summits, although they have been attacked. They are Mount Pinnacle, which was attempted three times in one season, but without success; the north tower of Mount Goodwin, Mount Douglas and Mount Sanford, discovered two years ago by triangulation to be the highest of the Selkirks, and the Mount Blanc of this section. All are worthy of the ambition of the most skillful climbers.

LONG JOURNEY.

The base of Mount Sanford has never been approached nearer than twenty-five miles. This mountain will be essayed by Benjamin S. Comstock, of New York City, a veteran Alpine climber, who has visited this region for six years. He will be accompanied by a companion and two Swiss guides. The start for the summit of the 11,000-foot peak will be made on July 10. It is believed that it will take at least ten days to perform the feat. If it is accomplished, to reach the base the party will drop down the Columbia river twenty-five miles in a canoe to the mouth of Green River, forty miles from the mountain's base. Up this stream they will push as far as possible before catching some of their food supplies and setting out on foot for the actual climb.

SPECIAL PARAPHERNALIA.

The train which bears the climbers into Glacier will disgorge a quantity of baggage of a character that will defy the most energetic effort of the baggage smasher. Thick-soled shoes studded with nails like a castle door and smelling like an automobile or some other maddening device; tough, ash-handled ice axes and thoroughly tested ropes in bundles will be among the pieces of baggage slung out of the doors of the cars.

Mountain climbing, like other sports, calls for special paraphernalia. And like the follower of other sports, the expert has his own ideas as to what is what. The thickness of the soles, the kind and number of nails and the best kind of oil to use in connection with the footgear, the weight of the ropes and the best kinds of knots and the balance of ice axes are all topics which may be depended upon to furnish as much excitement around the campfire as the discussion of an anti-gambing bill. Indeed, there is more reason for having things just right in this sport than in many others, for life may be dependent upon the "correctness" of the paraphernalia.

IMPORTANT DETAILS.

A pair of properly nailed boots is considered to be the most important detail of a climber's outfit. They must be waterproof to their very tops. Every nail must be driven with a steady and individuality that amounts to an art. Care must be taken to see that the leather is firm enough to hold the nails after they have been driven, for it would be inconvenient to have them come out when the wearer was part way up a rock face containing only two-inch nails. Nails are very important and are between the climber and the

of some well-known peak, and dependent upon the pushing and pulling powers of guides in the accomplishment of his ambition is likely to think it superior in rank to his footgear. The popular idea of the use of the Alpine climbing rope, with its strand of red, is sometimes amusing. One valuable young man at Zermatt was heard enlightening some friends in this fashion:—

JOINING THE PARTY.

"Ah, yes! They use the rope to prevent them from losing each other, and when they come to the glacier they take hold of it and climb it." Others have an idea that the guides attempt to rival the Indian fakirs who according to report take a coil of rope, throw it into midair, climb it and then pull the rope up after them. In reality, of course, it is used not so much as an adjunct to climbing as a means of safety for the whole party, which attached by the rope, spreads out its base over the dangerous ground.

There are many kinds of knots used for joining the members of the party together. The necessity for doing this stoutly and surely, is illustrated by an incident told by Mr. Comstock. Mr. Comstock was a member of a party of four last summer which were endeavoring to climb Mount Aberdeen in the Selkirks. They were using a short rope. The last man on the line (Mr. Mitchell) was in the middle of a couloir, or deep gorge. The snow slid from beneath him, leaving him slipping in the bare ice without footing. The couloir terminated in a precipice, and a body falling would have dashed at least a thousand feet. As Mr. Mitchell's weight came upon the rope it untied. Fortunately at that moment he had managed to grasp the rope with his left hand, his ice axe being in his right. He succeeded in holding fast until in some way he managed to retie himself and was helped across the couloir to the rocks in which the remainder of the party were clinging.

EXPERT CLIMBERS.

The amateur often has to be initiated into such a detail as the proper part of the body about which to tie the rope. It was fortunate for a party of four inexperienced climbers being conveyed across a much canvassed snow-covered glacier in the Alps that they met a party of experienced climbers. They would have been tried by a Swiss who was ignorant of the business of guide, having undertaken the task in the absence of his father who was experienced. He had directed the members of his party to tie the rope about their necks. The expert climbers set the innocent right before mischief had been done.

The expert climbers are as finicky over the choice of his ice axe as a cricketer over his bat or a bowler over his ball. It is used for cutting steps in the snow and ice and when reversed to assist in climbing by means of the spiked handle. It is also used for testing the depth of the snow and the safety of ice bridges. It is the ice axe that the novice "doctors up" to give the impression that he is a mountaineer of long experience. All of the smearing with muddy oil or other mixture to destroy the glaring brightness of the metal will not avail to conceal his inexperience if he does not know how to carry the implement.

AXE FIEND.

There is in mountain climbing such a person as an axe fiend. He carries his axe with a degree of carelessness that may destroy the eyesight of a person coming up behind him.

A bag, a holding lantern for use in making early starts, goggles, a cooking outfit, field glass, fashio and warm clothing are not considered the more important details of the climber's outfit. They must be waterproof to their very tops. Every nail must be driven with a steady and individuality that amounts to an art. Care must be taken to see that the leather is firm enough to hold the nails after they have been driven, for it would be inconvenient to have them come out when the wearer was part way up a rock face containing only two-inch nails. Nails are very important and are between the climber and the
