Lady Marjorie's Love

"Otherwise it would be an extreme liberty to point that Peter the Hermit had nothing whatever to do with the invention of gunpowder, but so far as I can form any estimate of his character was quite content to cut the throats of his fellow-creatures, the good time-honored way; or that it was he and not the venerable Bede, who is supposed to be principally responsible for the Crusades; or that the Spanish Armada did not seek to invade these shores in consequence of the death of the two young princes in the Tower. I entertain no doubt whatever that Spain was fully as ready to choke a young prince as ever we could be, providing that she found reason to regard him as a superfluous creature. As for such a trifle as mistaking the Red for the Black Sea, and confusing the respective locations of the Himalayas and the Rocky Mountains, they are little mistakes that might happen to anybody. But still—again strictly from the generosity point of view—I fear you may find them drawbacks."

"Well I don't care." She gave a defiant little shrug and toss, and though she was half inclined to laugh at herself, she also blushed. "If I have made all those mistakes when I have been talking to you," she said with a pout, "you must have laughed at me nicely, I should think. But I can't help it. I told you I wasn't clever to begin with, you know. A pause. "And as for those ridiculous people I don't care who they were or what they did. They are all dead and most of them were wretches when they were alive."

Another pause and a vicious tweak at Jack's ear, whereas soured so monstrosity. "And as for those absurd old mountains, I don't see why it need matter a scrap to me where they are. I don't want to go climbing up them." A third pause, and a little footstap tritably upon the flags. "Since you are so excessively observant, possibly you can point a few more things upon which I am ignorant."

"Possibly, I'll try. I sit to be corrected, but am right in limiting my serious suspicions that your knowledge of trigonometry and the higher mathematics may be slightly hazy?"

"I don't know anything about either of them"—flattly. "Exactly, as I thought. May I ask what are your views upon the atomic theory?"

"Whatever is that?" "Or—to leave the beginning of things and come down to the ethics of the nineteenth century—what do you consider to be the principal points of divergence between the respective philosophies of Huxley and Herbert Spencer?"

"Oh don't be so ridiculous." The remonstrance was as vigorous in tone and gesture as in words. Marjorie having made it stared out of the window over Jack's head. If she had let her eyes meet her companion's she knew she must laugh, and she did not choose to laugh. "He was silent because he preferred to wait until she spoke."

"I call it perfectly absurd," she grumbled, with her chin on Jack's sleek head. "Of course I don't know about the atomic theory, or whatever it is, and all the other stupid things, and I'm sure I don't want to know. What good would it do me? If I had children to teach what good would it do them? Not useful things, everyday things, things they would know after-wards! Do you want to overthrow the whole established and accepted system of English education, Lady Marjorie?"

"I don't want to do anything!" She flared, and posted. "I suppose that you really think Mr. Barrington really is that I'm too stupid to attempt to be a governess and that it is of no use my trying?"

"I don't think you stupid, which you don't need telling. But at the same time I am frankly—" "I told you before that you were."

"Well, with due apologies, and speaking strictly from a scholastic point of view, I'm bound in honor to confess that a more appallingly ignorant young person I never met with in the whole course of my life."

"Oh"—amazingly, n "Under commands and with all possible apologies!"—meekly. A pause. Marjorie straightened herself resolutely.

"I shall write to my aunt," she said. "Pour until" he had been looking at her. "The poise of her head, the curve of her cheek, the sweep of her lashes, a spectacle which naturally obliterated all other things mundane. Marjorie's eyes flashed impatiently. He had no business to be even momentarily oblivious of her aunt."

"Mrs. Paget," she said, "I'm sure I told you about her. Why I showed you her portrait the other day. Don't you recollect?"

 "Wibert Robinson says that Dave Robertson, McGraw's Virginia recruit looks better than did Marquard or Torsman when he took hold of them. Which is as pretty strong recommendation or Robby, Robertson's injured shoulder, it is believed to be all right again, and Robinson believes he is going to be a great pitcher."

Tampa business men raised $4,800 to pay the expenses of the Cubs in training and have already gotten it back from the receipts of exhibition games. It is said that President Murphy regrets that he did not pay expenses himself and take the receipts all. If the unsophisticated Tampanns have put one over on Chas. Webb it will occasion much comment.

The Red Sox will pay some big salaries this year if a statement from Boston is accurate. Tris Speaker's contract calls for $9,000. Smokey Joe Wood will receive $7,500 for his services in the box. Charley Wagner the shortstop, will draw $6,500 if it is said, and Larry Gardner's pay will exceed $6,000. Jake Stahl, as manager and first baseman, has a $10,000 contract. Duffy Lewis and Hooyer have signed for $5,000 each, and Bill Carrigan recently lined up for $4,500. The Sox's entire salary list will reach $80,000 it is estimated.

Ball Notes

There is another Jennings in the American League, a young first baseman, who has been signed by Washington for a tryout. He is from the Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College, where he was said to have made a great reputation on the ball team. His first name is Morley.

John McGraw is quoted as saying that in the ten years he has managed the Giants he has been seeking for a Cobb or a Speaker, and he believes he has found a combination of the two in Claud Cooper, the Fort Worth recruit. Some pretty big boosts have been given rookies but this tops them all.

John Clancy, the New Orleans recruit with the Naps at Pensacola, tells proudly that he was the roommate of Jim Thorpe while the two were players on the Fayetteville team of the Eastern Carolina league. Johnny, by the way is a cousin of William Clancy, the Eastern Carolina manager who first tipped off that the Indian had played professional ball, and according to Johnny some few hundred ball players knew it before the A. A. U. got its eyes open.

Much interest was stirred up at Boston when a story was printed that Manager Stallings of the Braves, from the training camp in Georgia had sent transportation to Bill Bradley, former third baseman of the Naps. It developed, however, that the transportation was for a youngster named Smith that Bradley had recommended and the ticket was sent for him in Bradley's care. Bradley belongs to Toronto, but is a holdout, objecting to a cut under the new International League salary limit.

In spite of Manager Stallings' declaration that no one would be allowed in the training camp of the Braves unless signed to a contract, Pitcher Lefty Tyler made the trip without that formality, his manager
