Hotel on Third street.

It was cold, cold. The breath from the steaming horses congealed into white frost on the glittering harness, as they halted in the road, and the firemen jumped from their places and elapped their hands and ears. But there was no sign of a confiagration. The few worthy citizens who had been disturbed from their slumbers by the clanging of the gongs in the stlent night, and had followed up the brigade on the dead run, stood around and stamped their feet and swung their arms. Where was the fire?
