Community of Nationality May Bring All Sections of Ireland Together In Time

T. P. O'Connor Still Hopetful That Emerald Isle Will Soon See All Differences Swept Aside and That All Sections Will Unite in an Earnest Attempt to Make Home Rule a Success, and Add Another Bulwark to the Dominions of the Empire--Dissatisfaction With the Delays Incident to Irish Negotiations Creating Bad Feeling Among Irishmen

(Cable Letter by T. P. O'Connor, Copyright.) London, July 22.—Three names wide apart are joined today in parliamentary warfare—Mesopotamia, Dardanelles-Ireland. The fact that brings such dissimilar elements together is that in all three cases the same charges are made against the present ministry, namely: Delay, procrastination, indecision, and divided councils. It is possible that Premier Asquith's extraordinary adroitness, especially in view of the terror caused by the thought of substituting for him in the middle of the war another man of untried quantity, together with the universal respect his abilities command as acknowledged by all his former foes as well as friends, may save him once again at a time when his fate seems sealed. However, this has been his worst week in the House of Commons since the beginning of the war, many of his statements being received with derisive laughter from several parts of the House.

NO REPUDIATION OF LANSDOWNE SPEECH. It is known that Lloyd-George was angry and Premier Asquith disturbed by the speech, but although it was roundly denounced by Redmond, no repudiation came from Lansdowne. In the meantime things in Ireland by came worse instead of better. Disappointment over the delay and resentment of Lansdowne's speech, the general unrest caused by Maxwell's executions and raids, were ready weapons in the hands of factional extremists who desired to destroy both the settlement and the Irish party. Suggestions also were made of modifications to the settlement which would have made it impossible of acceptance, and Redmond, working incessantly though quietly, had to warn the ministry in the strongest terms of the perils of the situation. It is not possible to say just what will be the final outcome for everything both in and outside of the House of Commons at present is in a state of delicate balance. Anything may happen, from a breakup of the ministry to a return to open conflict on Ireland between the Irish party and the present ministry. It looks at the moment like another of England's many lost opportunities of winning the confidence and affections of the Irish people.

PRACTICALLY DECIDED THE FATE OF IRELAND. There will never be an authentic account of the remarkable convention of Irish Nationalists at Belfast, which practically decided the fate of Ireland for many generations. This is a great loss to history and perhaps to Ireland. One speech alone would have been sufficient to make the meeting historic, apart altogether from the fatefulness of the decisions; that speech, of course, was Mr. Devlin's, which swept the convention off its feet, and made what was a very doubtful result at the beginning quite certain. Indeed that speech accounted for the majority in favor of the Lloyd-George settlement; for it not only gained votes but it so disturbed and moved the consciences of some of the men who had come into the room pledged to vote against the settlement that they left the room rather than break their pledge, on the one side, or, on the other, vote against what Mr. Devlin had shown them to be the interest of Ireland. I do not go back, however, on the Ulster Nationalist convention for the purpose of relating the personal incidents, but rather to point out its significance in the future of Ireland. It is admitted by everybody who was present that the convention was orderly, patient, self-restrained; that everybody was listened to in patience; that the interruptions were few and far between, and then were sternly repressed; that there wasn't a particle of flapdoodle talk--of which there has been a regular deluge in Ireland since the rebellion; in fact that a great convention was worthy of a great historic moment and of the portentous issues. An Englishman who was present declared that if he had ever any doubts of the fitness of Irishmen for self-government this convention would have removed them.

START EXPERIMENT OF SELF-GOVERNMENT. But now comes the sad reflection that Ireland will have to start the experiment of self-government without the assistance of these Ulstermen, and of the Ulstermen of both camps. For it is right to put the Ulstermen together, widely as they differ in political and religious conviction. They resemble each other much more than either of them resembles their political friends in the south. Of course there is a tendency on both the one side and the other to bitterness and to narrowness; this is inevitable; for the bigotry of the Orangemen naturally reacts on the Nationalist, and renders his creed a little harder and more assertive than in the softer atmosphere of the south. On the other hand, these political virtues, which have infused into each other a number of strong political virtues. They are uncompromising; they are at the same time businesslike; above all, they have discipline and unity. In all the many splits that have divided the rest of Ireland the Ulster Nationalists have stood apart; even in those hours when a spirit of something approaching despair dried up the courage and the funds of the Nationalists in the south of Ireland and even among the Irish abroad. The Ulster Nationalists still maintained their organization and their subscriptions. Every year for more than a quarter of a century the subscription of £1,000 came regularly from Belfast. These are the men who will not be represented in the new Irish parliament. On the other hand, the other type of Ulsterman is equally at a loss; for they again have revealed very remarkable business powers. The harbor of Belfast is very well managed; the Belfast man is very businesslike, prompt, ready to meet the views of his customers, able to get hold of trade; building up a city with something of the feverishness of an American city; and gradually attracting to his capital a great proportion of the business of the whole south of Ireland. It is from Belfast that the southern grocer gets his tea; it is from Belfast that the southern draper gets a great part of his cloth and the ready-made dresser the goods which at one time clothing business exclusively to Leeds and other English cities--has now been taken in hand by Belfast. I may add the well-known fact that the banks of Belfast collect the money which the thrifty and now prosperous farmers of the south of Ireland are willing to give at 2 1/2 per cent or 3 per cent, on deposit account and invest it in a thriving and so ahead city like Belfast at six or seven per cent.

LOST OPPORTUNITY FOR UNITED ACTION. These are the relations between Ulster and the rest of Ireland, and while wailing a little--as one must do over the lost opportunity for the moment of bringing these two parts of Ireland together for the common benefit of the country--the proper thing to do at present is to see how far these things can be remedied in the future. I am convinced that the partition of Ireland will be of short duration. Even already I see signs of the beginning of the end of partition. For one of the many paradoxes of Irish life is that, while these northerners are so divided--fiercely divided from one another, they can always find common ground in an even greater dislike of other people. I made the observation to a prominent member of the Irish party that I was rather astonished sometimes at my own psychology during an Irish debate. I could hear, I said, one of the Orangemen abuse my principles, my party, myself, without turning a hair--I did not stir my blood or make my pulse beat faster a second; but when, on the other hand, an English Tory soldier got up and began to abuse us, I saw red. "But my dear T. P.," answered my Orange friend, "it is just the same way with me. I can hear you or any other of the Nationalists--even Joe--(meaning Mr. Devlin), attack me and my party and my friends, and I don't mind--indeed, I rather like Joe; but when one of these English

Nonconformist Liberals gets up, then But I haven't transfer to these chaotic columns what my Orange friend said. BOTH IRISH PARTIES OPPOSE ENGLISHMEN. By a curious freak of political fortune, the Orangemen and the Nationalists find themselves today in the position of opposing Englishmen together; taking the same side; urging the same case; pleading for the same remedy. Their position--as strongly felt by the one as by the other--is that the question of Ireland is a question to be settled by Irishmen themselves; and in the Lloyd-George settlement they found common ground. Then came along a certain number of Englishmen who begin to try to undo their work, raise all kinds of difficulties and suggest all kinds of impossibilities. At once the call of the blood was heard by both the Orange men and the Nationalists. For nothing has been more admirable and more remarkable than the steady and inflexible loyalty with what the Orange leaders have stood by their contract. Sir Edward Carson was interviewed, cross-examined, I am told, by a reporter; treated by the British journalists; he didn't budge an inch; he had given his word; he meant to keep it. The same was true of the other Orange leaders, with this curious and paradoxical result; that the Orangemen and the Nationalists find themselves on the common ground of resenting this English interference and of fighting the same battle with the same arguments, and the same zeal. What moral must one draw from these things? That after all, and in all their differences these Orangemen feel themselves Irishmen just as much as their Nationalist fellow-countrymen; that they know that and all their differences they understand each other better than the Englishmen understand them, and that in time, when both sides have shown their respect for each other's differences, they will be drawn together inevitably and per-
