and not "Vive Gambetta!" After referring to the war, "in which the republicans, for honour's sake, carried on what they had not begun," M. Gambetta spoke of his excellent reception in Savoy where the "journals of order" had declared there were none but Legitimists and clericals, and went on to refer to the difficulties which had been thrown in the way of public meetings, contending that the Republican party had always shown themselves ready to fully obey the laws, even absurd ones, whereas the self-styled party of order only created disorder, and were agents of riot and defamation. "After all," continued M. Gambetta, "have those who govern us carefully reflected what Democracy really means? With all their apparatus of laws against public meetings, how can they expect the country to benefit by Republican institutions? Electors and elected should have full liberty to communicate with each other, to exchange ideas, and for the elected to give an account of their conduct to their constituents. This is practised by English public men, by lords as by the most democratic members of the House of Commons. This is the case, too, in Switzerland. When will it be understood in France that a new order of ideas must be adopted in politics?" The new Democracy which dates from 1789, but only took root in 1848, thanks to universal suffrage, cannot, M. Gambetta said, be governed "according to the principles of the eighteen or twenty rhetoricians who ruled parliamentary France." Power had now passed, after different modes of government, to a new social rank. They had every right to hope for better things, for at every election, either of councillors-general or deputies, good Republicans are returned. "Let us," he said, "get rid of that foolish timidity which has done so much harm to France. It is this timidity to which we owe the Second Empire, and which now more than anything else hinders the acceptance of a real Republic; and, above all, let us Republicans be prudent, and success is certain." The mere use of the word prudence had exasperated their enemies, for it ended their dearest hopes. "They counted on some false step of the Republican Party, and, behold, the false steps have been all on the other side. It is we now who are on the side of law and order; and it is not those who try to consolidate the Republic, but those who try to overthrow it, who are disturbers of public order. The country is with us, and very soon we shall have the reality, as we have now the name of a Republic. How comes it, I wonder, that those fiery representatives of Divine Right do not meet their electors? Are they afraid of the reception they would receive? All they have done is to discover that the republic must be established. Ah, if the Assembly of Versailles did not know it was dying, it would never make the marriage "in extremis" with the Republic. Now, let us beware of these Republicans of the eleventh hour. Let us have nothing to do with chiefs who now come over to us. Let us have no renegades in our ranks." Then followed a violent attack on the Bonapartists, which was received with much applause. "As to the present Assembly," continued Gambetta, "you can do nothing with those people at the head and heart of Republican France."

ONE of the most shocking railway accidents which has occurred for some time took place recently on the Caledonian line at Kirtlebridge station, about seventeen miles north of Carlisle. The English express train, made up of carriages from London, Manchester, and Liverpool, which is timed to leave Carlisle at 6 a.m., had been delayed for nearly two hours—through the breaking of an axle, it is said—between Lancaster and Carlisle, and was running at the full speed of two powerful engines through Kirtlebridge station, on its way to Carlisle, when a mineral train was shunted right across its path. The express dashed a number of the mineral waggons to atoms, and the engines plunged forward for some distance, carrying with them heaps of debris. Several of the passenger carriages were smashed to pieces, eleven persons were killed on the spot, and a considerable number very seriously hurt. The scene of ruin at the station is said to have been "such as has seldom been witnessed, even by men who have had large experience in such matters. The force of the collision had been so terrific that mineral waggons had been hurled about in all directions as if they had been as light as handboxes. The second, third, and fourth carriages in the train were completely destroyed. One was stripped of all its compartments, having only the framework unbroken, and the other two were dashed to atoms." The station-master was taken into custody in the afternoon.
