ceived promotion for gallantry on the field at Gallipoli. Jack was a brilliant student at the Methodist College, whence he entered Oxford in 1908 as Rhodes Scholar. We have very pleasant personal recollections of him at the University, where his modesty and engaging personality won him a host of friends. At that time, when the host of friends. At that time, when the host of friends at the marvellous ability. He was to finance what Kitchener, whom he succeeds, was to war. The gratitude, freely expressed, of bankers and business men generally was a striking tri-which included many Rhodes Scholars. He studied in the School of Forestry, won his Degree, and shortly after leaving Oxford was appointed to a position of responsibility in Vancouver. At the outbreak of war he at once offered himself to a Canadian Regiment, but was rejected on physical grounds. Nothing daunted, he joined the Army Service Corps and crossed with it to England. He afterwards accepted a commission in a battalion of the London Post Rifles, in which he received his first experience of actual fighting in February of this year.

We were fortunate in being able to see a letter from Captain Mitchell to his father, in which are broadly but vividly described the experiences in which he distinguished himself. His regiment faced the Prussian Guards in a storm of fire which was indescribed be. One by one his friends were struck Gown at his side, either killed or wounded. His own escape in describes as miraculous. For forty hours he remained under heavy fire, with practically no food, sustained only by the excitement of hattle. He promises in a subsequent letter to
