

The Rival Glansmen

A Scottish Vendetta.
CHAPTER XIX.
THE PURSUIT.

Flora struggled wildly in the hands of her captor. Every impulse and instinct urged her to do so. The danger which a few minutes before had been but dreaded was now actually seen and felt, and in no worse shape could it have presented itself. Ian McKenzie, the Cateran, the libertine, the sworn enemy of her Hector, alone with her on such circumstances was enough indeed to inspire her with terror; for well she knew his intentions, and that he would scruple at nothing, however villainous, to carry them out.

But Flora was brave, and genuine courage becomes bolder in the face of danger. Ian still kept his hand on her mouth, so that she could utter no cry; but she set herself to remove it, as she knew that if she could but make herself heard, assistance would not be long wanting. She thought not that she might be accompanied by others; she thought not of how he had come there; he was there beside her, with her in his power, and she must free herself if possible.

M'Kenzie said nothing, but clasped her firmly in his arms, and, struggle as she might to free herself, he retained his hold and was slowly and surely tiring her out. At length, lifting her from the floor, he flung her upon the bed, and enveloping her in the covering, was about to again raise her in his arms when a loud scream burst out from another part of the Castle. Flora heard the cry, and a thrill of hope and terror shot through her as it broke upon her ear. It was the cry of Anne M'Leod. While it was a sure summons help and assistance, it also bespoke the presence of more enemies in the Castle than the one with whom she was struggling, for it was evident that the lady of the Castle had also been attacked. How she regretted now that she had not flown to Hector to communicate to him her fears!

Ian, too, had heard the cry, and, uttering a deep oath, muttered—
"Discovered! What foul mischance is this? But I will not be balked. This is the room; can I get the opening? I would give worlds for a little light; how unlucky that the others have the torches."
But even as he spoke a breath of air fanned the embers, and a momentary gleam burst forth.
"Ha!" he exclaimed, "the devil is in league with me to-night; I can find my way now."
Lifting Flora in his arms, he quickly darted to a corner of the room. The poor girl heard a creaking sound as of a door opening and shutting; then she felt herself more firmly clasped in M'Kenzie's arms, and heard him mutter, in a tone of exultant glee—
"Now, Miss Flora Macgregor, you are mine at last; and by this time Hector M'Leod's body is pierced with weapons and his pillow dyed with his gore."
