The night air was crisp, but in place of the earthy smell scented with the perfume of nuts, which he knew now flavored the air at home, he was greeted with a salty foulness. Tonight this nauseated him. He tried to get away from it, and at the end of a half-hour's walk found himself in the park. He sat down on a bench near an electric light and once again read the news item about Barney. So, as a matter of fact, Bella was not his wife at all. She had no claim whatever upon him. So far as the law went he was as free as when he left home. Home!
