full list of our dead who fell at that battle, all on separate cards. Just to the right of this a card: "Died from wounds received at battle of Modder River," and in front of this card a list on separate cards of those who have died from their wounds. On the right side a card reading: "Canadians who were killed at the Relief of Kimberley," and in front of this card the names, the same as in the Modder River battle, the manner of display being the same, but the names different. Then, to the left, a card: "Those who died from wounds received at battle of Relief of Kimberley." In front of this the names of those who have since died. In the centre and just below the mourning card was a card reading: "Canadians who were killed while serving in the Imperial Army," and in front of it the three names, Capt. C. A. Hensley, Lieut. J. W. Osborne, and Lieut. C. C. Wood. The latter display caused considerable comment, and was greatly admired by all who saw it.

In honor of St. Patrick's Day the firm had another tasteful display. In one window a "Patriotic Irish Creation" was shown, white silk being used as the background, with green satin and ribbon as decorations and the "Harp of Old Ireland" as the centrepiece. Along the bottom was a quantity of shamrock, interspersed with Irish mottoes, and in the centre was Bengough's latest poetic effort. The other display was of Irish linens and curtains.

These displays are highly creditable to the designer, and would naturally attract the attention of a town full of buyers.

Readers of THE DRY GOODS REVIEW will remember that St. George's Day falls on Monday, April 23, and that it is a good occasion for a patriotic window.

KHAKI WASH SUITS.

The military authorities having adopted khaki as the most suitable color for our troops in South Africa, there has been created a great demand for all articles of wearing apparel in this shade. Boulter & Stewart are showing a full line of ladies' wash suits, skirts, etc., made in khaki colors and correct military style. There should be a strong demand for this class of goods. See their ad. on page 23.

Mr. Frederick W. Watkins, of Hamilton, has been appointed buyer and manager of the dry goods section of The Stanley Mills & Co.'s departmental store business carried on in that city.

Speaking of the general craze for special sales of one kind and another, and the eagerness with which people wait for these, in preference to buying at ordinary rates, a contemporary tells of a clerk who advised a lady to hurry up and purchase her goods before the store took fire. "Oh, no," said the lady, "I think I will wait until the fire sale." The story is, of course, imaginary, but it points to a moral.
