

angry nurse, giving the child a sudden jerk, brought her close up to them, and said, "Here, missis, do take her and pop her in there, and carry her out to the sea, will ye? That's where all bad children are sent, isn't it?" and as she spoke she winked at the woman, who returned it, and one in a harsh voice muttered, "Aye, aye, bring her here."

In a moment the crying ceased, the little girl walked quietly on, shaking from head to foot with fear. Nor did she ever again enjoy being on that beach. The sight of the machines and bathing women dwelt on her mind—when left for a moment alone, she remembered them—at night, when she laid down on her little bed, she covered up her face with the clothes, and every noise startled her. She was an irritable, nervous child, and had been brought to the sea for her health. Little did her mother know why she grew paler every day, and less and less enjoyed her walks. Then bathing was ordered; the child cried bitterly when she heard it, but her mother laughed it off, and accompanied her herself the first morning, which was about a week after the occurrence Esther saw with the nurse. Esther was again sitting on the beach with John, and she heard the child's screams; these however, soon ceased, and when she was lifted into her mother's arms, who was waiting in the machine to receive her, she was in a fit!

The nurse, — that thoughtless, unprincipled nurse, who to save herself trouble had frightened the child,—now lifted up her hands as she saw the rigid frame, the tightly clenched lips and limbs, saying, "Dear, dear! who would have thought it! dear me! how flustered I am—what a turn it has given me, I declare!" and so on.

Esther perceiving that something serious was the matter, hastened to the spot and helped to hold the suffering child, while a messenger was sent for a medical man. Fit succeeded fit. At length they managed to convey her home, where warm baths and other remedies were used. The parents wondered that she should have been so seriously frightened at being bathed, for she had often before talked of it with pleasure. Some said bathing could not agree with her—the nurse hinted that it was the "shock," for she was always so timid and weak. The real truth no one knew but herself. For many many days, the anxious parents had little hope of her life, or if that was spared, they feared idiocy; and it is as well to state here, that though this severe trial was not sent, still the little girl's constitution never recovered the blow. She was always afterwards subject to fits and nervous to a painful degree—the effects followed her to the grave!

"Indeed, ma'am," said Esther to Miss Marston when talking it over. "Indeed I thought at the time how wrong it was to frighten the child so, though I dare say the woman never thought of what she was doing, and when children are so contrary one does and says things one is sorry for afterwards!"

"Wrong!" said Miss Marston. "I think a person who wilfully frightens a child, deserves almost any punishment. It is bad enough to frighten them indirectly and unintentionally—I mean, to let a child fancy things as they are apt to do, when a few words of explanation might quiet them and do away with their fancies; but wilfully and purposely to work on their fears and pervert the truth—what can be worse?"

"I have always heard mother say," returned Esther, "how fond folks used to be of frightening children, and how she was alarmed herself when a little thing. She could not bear it, and has often cautioned us against it."

"Yes," said Miss Marston, "Many years ago old nurses were very fond of telling horrid stories, and talking of ghosts and those kind of things—they were themselves more superstitious than people are now; but I doubt if these old nursery tales had ever the bad effect that such a trick as has been played on this poor child is likely to have. Those were stories told to amuse them, and in affection, though perhaps injudiciously selected; but such abominable, coldhearted threats as this woman made use of, has not one shadow of excuse."

Here the conversation ended. The next few days were occupied with packing and preparing to go home, and the following week found them once more in Mr. Parker's house.
