

showed that about 15% at the most would be in the select group. The withdrawal of all such men from the other groups would remove the pace-setters, and to that extent would be harmful to a large number in our classes. The general feeling at the moment is that such pace-setters are not being sacrificed by being included in the general group, and that taking our course as a whole they find in it a sufficient outlet for their abilities. Unusual ability is not hampered, because much of the work in our fourth year courses affords opportunity for the exercise of special talents.
