THE EVENING STORY

A Man of Doubt and a Soul
Written for the Boston Traveler by Andrew Hadden

The conflict was over; at the last moment the powerful and almost victorious side had surrendered everything, and by lack of action conceded the victory to the opposing party.

Everybody was disappointed.

Henry Sonera, the vigorous, resourceful man of genius, to refuse to go ahead and clinch his victory, when his opponent were brought to their knees and gasping!

The senatorial party was jubilant. It emphasized its victory by rapidly putting Sonera out of the Senate in less than three days, without a protest on his part.

This had no effect; Sonera was silent and troubled; the old deviousness was gone; he vacillated and finally bent his head and retired.

Newspaper men sought him in droves to find his reason for this inexplicable action. Still he equivocated and tried to excuse himself; his party managers grew enraged and furious, and this frightened him.

A shrewd congressional king-maker offered to elect him, as a martyr to the senatorial party, to Congress. He could not reply; he would gladly consider, but still made no answer.

Meanwhile, his health was getting alarmingly. He expressed great weariness when he was talked to, and shunned his former friends.

Suddenly, the day that he must decide one way or the other whether he would take the nomination of the congressional district or not, he dropped dead. The country was startled, attributing everything to sickness, and forgot it all.

Thus, Henry Sonera came to an untimely end at 40 years of age.

That's what it looked like on the outside. But the true reason was what follows.

Forty years before there were two babies in the little city of Roswell, Iowa. One was the son of Philip Sonera, the ex-mayor of the town, a prosperous grocer. The other was the son of Alfred Nilow, the wealthy and powerful banker, now in the State Senate, and the power of Roswell county.

The home of Nilow was called "the Palace." It commanded Tyler street and Washington road, the two chief streets of the town. Next to it was the school building, just around the corner of the church, and a mile's walk down Tyler street, the City Hall.

The home of Nilow was next door to their store, near the Nilow house. There was a large family, and none were better known in the city than the sons and daughters of the general grocer.

The two boys grew up. Both seemed healthy at first, but as he grew older the one child of the banker was weak and sickly. Small and pale, restless and feverish, the misgiving never ceased that he would die.

Henry Sonera was robust and good-humored. He was bright in school, and he charmed his way through the dangers of sickness, and yet he showed hesitation to hesitate to distrust his brother.

His character was not yet formed. The doctor said, but as he grew older it was more and more noticeable. He was large, healthy, red-checked and open to the world, but he seemed to distrust his brother.

The lonely banker, a widower, with his housekeeper and maid, lived much the same. He pitied his child, sincerely, for now spinal meningitis was added to the poor fellow's misfortune. His pity turned into hate toward his less wealthy brother, and he began to plot against him. He grew to be a rascal, and became renegade in dealing with the poor.

Nothing could be done for his boy, specialists and doctors of great reputations were summoned to cure him, but all failed. He died, and turned away from the father, despairing of his rescue from the terrible disease, was himself carried off at the age of 50 from worry and disappointment.

Young Walter Nilow, left to fight on his weary battle with the doctor, sat at the window and watch the other children go to and from school. He was a greedy, restless and ambitious boy, and he was not content with the education he had by his own efforts. A fiery and vigorous spirit animated him; he cursed his deformity in his imagination to act, and move and do something.

He sat at the windows and used his great imagination, forecasting the destiny of all who passed. He was a character reader, and had a penetrating intellect, which saw things as they really were. As he watched him day by day a sort of enthusiasm entered his mind, when he thought of the brilliant future of Sonera, for he judged that fortune had a trick of favoring the doubters. Even he, with all his limited capacity to become acquainted with people, saw the health and marked weakness of will which clogged the actions of his friend.

He commenced putting himself in his place, as it were, imagining what he himself would do, if confronted by Henry's life problems.

He planned a brilliant course of study and learned with great surprise and delight that Sonera was following that same line of study.

Sonera at last graduated from school. Then he was going East, to a great college to study. He called on Walter Nilow before he went, and promised to write to him often.

The doctor missed him very much. After his departure, he awaited every letter with great impatience. He was continually thinking of what was to be done. The four years were over, and Henry Sonera returned, a tall and strong young man. He still had that open and confident face, but his old look of hesitation was disappearing. He relied now on a sort of suggestive oracle in his mind, that told him do what was right. This was the direction of his master-mind, Walter Nilow.

The very year Henry Sonera was nominated for mayor. His opponent, Mayor Wells, now in his sixty-third year, had for the better chance. He was positive of election, and so were his lieutenants. But the scheming director of Sonera's mind put in his hand a truly ingenious scheme. Scott, the chairman of Sonera's committee of lieutenants, was a notorious double-dealer and giver. Three weeks before the election Sonera had Scott arrested and after a short and vigorous trial the astounded politician was sentenced to five years.

Sonera was elected mayor by a large majority, and just 30 years after his father's death.

For many years the clean and energetic administration of Sonera was taken as a model by his successors. His old doubtful character had passed entirely away. He was quick, decisive and vigorous, and all the time that he lived and under the orders of Nilow he lived and moved. He and Nilow himself, for that matter, were unconscious of the connection; but it was true, and constant, that never a question of growing truer, that never a question presented itself to the mayor's mind, which did not find an answer there, decisive and complete.

Henry Sonera refused reelection, and was sent to the State Senate in two years he was the most famous member of the Iowa Legislature. He was the leader of a new party, the reformers, and all the time that he was holding de facto office at opponents or issuing political orders. Walter Nilow was at home in Roswell, putting out newspapers of Sonera's frequent letters, and laying out the plan of campaign.

The next year, Henry Sonera was elected Lieutenant-Governor by an enormous majority. Now in his 29th year, he had vast control over the people of his state, but he sought higher honors. At the age of 31 he was elected to the United States Senate to replace a lately deceased senator.

His reputation was now national. Already he had made his name. His old brother Joseph, was now mayor of Roswell; his other two brothers, George and Thomas, were in good positions, and his two sisters had married wealthy lawyers.

He continued his good work. His opposition to the two older parties split the whole Senate against him. The struggle was terrific for four years. He was victorious in the first round. He was victorious in the second, and again he won. He was victorious in the third, and again he won. He was victorious in the fourth, and again he won. He was victorious in the fifth, and again he won. He was victorious in the sixth, and again he won. He was victorious in the seventh, and again he won.
