The French Mother.

(A. M. Belding).

They call you Emperor, but you have killed my son,—
My son! The hope of my old age,—What had he done?

If murder be a crime, that stain is on your soul,

Oh Emperor! Whose mad ambition levies toll

On mothers' hearts amid the wreck of hope and home—
Was that his voice—my son's? No, no,—he will not come;

On Christmas morn they buried him on Yser's banks—
On Christmas morn, oh Emperor—do you give thanks

That Christ was born, to save the souls of sinful men?

"Thy kingdom come"—Is it a German kingdom, then?

My son was fair to see, Can I forget the years
I shared with him his joys and soothed his childish fears? He never cared to roam,—the current of his life So led and merged with mine that when this awful strife Had torn him from my side, my very heart was rent, Had torn him from my side, my very heart was rent,
And all my days were dark, my nights in anguish spent.

I see him now as when he nestled in my arms,
A trustful babe, secure from all of life's alarms,
My first and only born, the pledge of that dear love
Which had transformed my world, ere yet the storm of war
Had swept his father from our side. Oh, God! how far We two have journeyed since the dreadful message came, You were a child then, Emperor, and not to blame,—
That I was widowed and my boy was fatherless,
With few in all the world to pity our distress.

And now my son is gone! My life is cold and bare— To whom should I appeal for love, or whither fare? All that I loved is lost, and I am old and weak, And worn with toil,—They do not answer when I speak, Whose lips my lips have pressed, who were the world to me, Before the sad years brought the curse from Germany.

But France, my France, shall live, though I be gone to dust;
Her steadfast, fighting soul defies your bayonet thrust.
She has not fought the last of Gallic tyrants down.
To yield a servile homage to your iron crown.
The Paris road, if you but read the signs aright,
Has graves for milestones, and is haunted in the night
By spectral hosts, that rise from long forgotten years
Of hitter strife of long dearn account and tears Of bitter strife, of long drawn agony and tears, To bear dumb witness to the truth that France will rise, Though beaten to her knees by ruthless enemies, And with a soul undaunted seek her destiny, Enthroned their peer among the nations of the free.

But you and yours, mad Emperor! Whose savage creed Would doom the helpless mothers of the world to breed Their sons for slaughter—What have you to hope or gain? Do you not hear the waii of sorrow for the slain? Your work, oh Emperor! Whose very throne was built On greed of power and wars that shamed the world-Your guilt Will bring the judgment swift and sure—But oh the cost— The strength of all the brave young lives forever lost,— The broken hearts, the mother's tears, the orphans' woe, The trenches turned to strong men's graves beneath the snow Blasphemer! Do you dare assert the right Divine

To deluge earth with blood and tears? By what great sign Do you maintain the justice of the sacrifice
Of lives by millions? Gambler! You have thrown the dice
In hope to win the lordship of the world; but He Who is the arbiter of human destiny,
Who from the soul of evil plucks the good and true,
With steadfast purpose all the stormy ages through,
Will crush your proud ambition to the blood-stained sod,
And drag your naked soul before the bar of God.

I will not curse you, Emperor.—But oh, the graves!
The graves beneath the snow; the dead beneath the waves;
The roofless homes; the temples shattered by the shell;
The helpless victims outraged by your hounds of hell.—
These—these will rise, and brand your nation and your name,
Aye, and your memory, with everlasting shame.
I will not curse you, but you bear the brand of Cain,
Your brothers' blood cries out from every battle plain.
You might have made the earth a nobler heritage,
And writ your name in gold on history's cherished page,—
Instead you chose the baser part, and nevermore Instead you chose the baser part, and nevermore
Will Peace consent to dwell within your guarded door,
The brood of hate and fear, the torture of defeat Will haunt you all your days, and there is no retreat
Will shield you from a conscience winged with every dart
Your vengeful wrath has levelled at a mother's heart;

But oh, my son,—God pity me! My tears are dry. You might have spared my boy to me.—Nought else had I To love and cherish in the wide wide world His voice was music in my ears, my comfort was his choice.

I hear him calling in the stillness of the night,

I know he called me ere his spirit took its flight— Aye! Called me as in years long gone, when to my breast
He fled for refuge as the young bird to its nest.—
You killed him Emperor! And I must hasten on,
I envy not your fate—I go—to join my son.
