Recently when the perennial "Charley's Aunt" was revived in London, the farce was preceded by "Good for Nothing," in which Brandon Thomas himself appeared as Tom Dikes, with Miss Thomas in the role of Nan, a character for which he had coached her. Needless to say, much of Miss Thomas' training was acquired from her father.

In the recent series of Shakespearean revivals at the Court Theatre, London, under Mr. Arthur Phillips' direction, Miss Thomas appeared as Portia in "The Merchant of Venice," winning golden opinions on all sides. It is in this famous role that she is here depicted.

Even more recently, when "Twelfth Night" was revived at His Majesty's for special Thursday and Saturday matinees during the run of Sir Herbert Tree's production of "The Merry Wives," Miss Amy Brandon Thomas appeared as the Countess Olivia. That her work in this role was highly commended is a noteworthy fact when it is remembered that she appeared with such skilful actors as Sir Henry Tree, who played Sebastian; Mr. Norman Forbes, who was Andrew Aguecheek; and Mr. Henry Ainley, who was the clown.
