ance to the visit. A little after eleven he said, 'Good-night,' and went to his own room. At the first alarm of fire, given by the Colonel, he tried to make his way to his father's bedroom, but found that the staircase was destroyed, and the whole passage leading from one side of the house to the other was a blazing furnace. Realizing the impossibility of proceeding further in that direction, he had returned to his room and made his escape by clambering down the ivy."

the house after his return at ten o'clock on the night of the fire?" asked Enid in evident surprise.

"I don't know that he said it in so many words; but he certainly implied it," was the reply, followed by the very natural query, "Why?"

"Oh!" hesitatingly, "nothing."

"Nonsense, child, you must have some reason for putting the question," interposed her father.

It was with evident reluctance that Enid explained.

"It was only that I thought I had seen him in the garden here at about 12 o'clock that night. I could not sleep, and looking out of the window I saw distinctly a man's figure outlined against the background of trees. It looked just like Dick, and I called him by name—but instead of coming nearer, when he heard my voice, the figure promptly vanished."

"Thus showing pretty conclusively that it was appeared."

vanished."

"Thus showing pretty conclusively that it was someone who had no business to be there," exclaimed the Colonel. "Why on earth, child, did you keep such an important fact to yourself?"

"Yes, I wonder you did not mention it, love," replied Mrs. Anerley, "the police ought certainly to have been told that someone was lurking about at that hour."

"I was convinced it was Dick," ans-

"I was convinced it was Dick," answered the young girl simply; "and so much has happened since that I never gave it a second thought until this moment—it went completely out of my mind."

gave it a second thought until this moment—it went completely out of my mind."

"Well, when the lad comes down we will ask him about it," said the Colonel; "but I am pretty sure what his answer will be beforehand. What possible reason could there be for his skulking round among the trees and vanishing when you spoke to him? Even if he had been writing a sonnet to your eyebrows, Enid, by the light of the moon; or gazing up at your windows, in orthodox lover fashion, when you spoke to him he would only have been too glad of a few words with you, whatever the hour. A Romeo who runs away when he sees his lady-love at the window is, to my mind, a suspicious character."

In her heart Enid was by no means convinced. It is difficult to deceive a lover's eyes, especially when they are young and keen as hers; and a lover's instinct is impervious to reason: something told her that the secret watcher had been Dick and no other. But if he wished the fact unknown—as from his silence upon the subject it would almost appear—she would cut out her tongue rather than betray him. She was vexed with herself for having mentioned it.

"Yes, I see now I must have been mistaken," she said hastily. Then, anxious to change the subject, turned again to the younger man, murmuring, "Go on, please, Mr. Alston."

"Really, there is not much more to tell; Pollard and some of the other members of the police force laid great stress upon the fact that Mr. Emoerson's body was found minus the head; but Dick very sensibly pointed out that the latter might have been pinned down by the burning beams right in the heart of the fire—in which case it was scarcely surprising that all trace of it should have disappeared."

"Who was that little dark fellow, Alston?" asked Colonel Anerley, "who stood at the back of the court during the

"Who was that little dark fellow, Alston?" asked Colonel Anerley, "who stood at the back of the court during the first stage of the proceedings, but went round afterwards and said something to the coroner?"

"I don't know, I am sure; but I think the questions that followed were put at his suggestion."

"What were they?" asked the two ladies eagerly.
