From Montreal to Halifax could be via the North Shore and Intercolonial railways River Ouelle, Edmandston, Fredericton and Moncton, 776 miles. This line could be shortened 20 to 30 miles by branching off hardship and no doubt if he would state the from Hartland to Moncton, and is practically the same as Sanford Fleming's central route for the Intercolonial.

Route number five would be via Lachine, Sherbrooke, Lake Megantic, Canterbury and Monctón, 736 miles. If this way is adopted heavy grading will be experienced, in some places up to 74 feet per mile. About 474 miles would yet require to be built. Taking St. John as a terminus from Montreal the route would be 490 miles; to Hartland 370 miles, and from there to St. John, via Fredericton, 120 miles. There would be yet to build upwards of 200 miles.

Another way of running a line between those places would be via Megantic, Canter-which. I trust, proved themselves—if not which. I trust, proved themselves—if not Route number five would be via Lachine,

That this feeling was not confined to New York city is shown by the following extracts. The Boston Globe said:—On the part of Gould, Elkins and Jones the claim to New York was based upon pure bluff, the idea being, of course, to so confuse matters that they might repeat the tactics practised on Louisiana in 1876 and steal the State. But New York under a free government and Louisiana under carpet-bag rule are two al-together different things. New York will not submit for a moment to any such infamy.
